Palmateer Settlement.

A district of country on the divide between Eagle creek and the Clackamas river, 28 or 30 miles southeast of Port-land, is so named from the early settle-ment of several families by that name there. Garrett Palmateer, a pioneer of '52, from Coldwater, Mich., settled there soon after coming to Oregon. He, together with his boys, took up a section of land on Palmateer prairie. The farms here are of reddish clay loam soil, quite productive, growing all kinds of quite productive, growing all kinds of grain and grasses, leguminous crops finely. Most orchard fruits generally do well. There will be a good one-half crop of prunes and apples, but few pears and no end of strawberries. Big Baldy is noted for its big huckleberry patch, consisting of several thousand acres, and is a great resort for huckleberry pickers in the fall. Taking the whole proposition, it is far ahead of anything that Portland could ever have hoped to secure. There has for years been a desire and an effort to get a competing metropolitan paper. The city and state need such competition. There is no city of the same size in the country without it. If this op-portunity is taken advantage of, it means more to the city and state, than anything else which could possibly be secured. It will mean the establishment many industries, and the bringing of both capital and population. It will, in short, attract attention to Portland and Oregon as one of the great and enterprising cities and states of the United
