The "Irish Duke," by local talent, Friday night, was most liberally patronized and favorably received. The consensus of opinion seems to be that the play is of small consequence—weak in plot, abounding in incongruities, and lacking in action—but that each character was well sustained and every opportunity cleverly handled. Professor Smith leaves shortly for Eugene or McMinnville. While here his department has been above reproach and he has earned the respect of the community. —Corvallis Gazette.

SIDNEY W. MOSS DEAD.

The Notable Pioneer Was 97 Years Old.

Hundreds of people, including Pioneers, Native Sons and friends of the family, attended the funeral services of the late Sidney W. Moss, held at the home of his daughter, Mrs. T. W. Clark yesterday afternoon. The sermon by Rev. A. J. Montgomery was impressive and peculiarly applicable to the ending of the life of one, who was a notable man among the earliest pioneers of Oregon. The floral offerings were tastefully arranged. His exact age has been disputed, but he was believed to have been 97. He was born in Paris, Ky., and followed stonecutting and building, as soon as he was old enough to work, although he has told the writer that he sometimes contributed to a local newspaper. In 1849 he crossed the plains to Oregon from Independence, Mo., reaching September 20th. He built the first hotel in Oregon City, and sent his partner East with $30,000 to purchase goods to stock a store, but the latter died at the isthmus of Panama on his return trip, and the money was lost.

Mr. Moss was the clerk of the first court in Oregon held under the auspices of the Provisional government, and filled many positions of trust thereafter. He also conducted a store. His first wife was a niece of Zachary Taylor and a daughter married the grandson of the first President Harrison. Mr. Moss survived all the members of his first family. At an early day in Oregon City Mr. Moss married Mrs. Richardson, and two children survive this union, Mrs. T. W. Clark and Walter Moss. Sidney Richardson, a stepson of the deceased, lives at Bandon. Mr. Moss died Tuesday afternoon at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Clark.
