ing in orders. AN ODE.

Way back in Indiana, When the century was old. It happened that a gentleman; Young, slender, brave and bold Led a maiden to the altar,

As man before has done; And uttered in a frightend voice, The vows which in wile them one. And wore the best of clothes, The glow of health was on her cheek. Some freckies on her nose, When the ceremony ended The Parson turned about, And introduced them to the world As, "Mr. and Mrs. Grout. "Wish you much j y" the people said ; And joy no doubt they had; But as they journeyed farther on, They found some roads were bad

And stumbled, just as others do, cerhaps at times fell out. When the husband probably himself proved

A very grouty Grout. While the wife developed temper, And sometimes forgot to smile, With measels, mumps and whooping cough,

Her patience to beguile. While oft she tried her skilful hand At cutting willow sprouts, And maintained family discipline. By switching little Grouts. Since they were wed that morn in May, The world has changed a lot, And we who keep well up in line Must strike a lively trot. But one old joy remains untouched By syndicate or trust, A jewel fair which they have kept Apart from sin and rust. The sacredness of wedded love Shines like an evening star, That guides us past the shoals of life, To peaceful heaven afar, So, tho' at times a cloud may come Which fateful storm protends, We gather here this evening To congratulate our friends; That whatever troubles they have had, Of any shape or course, They all were settled out of court, And short of a divorce We come with friendly greeting, And happy hearts to-night, To joke and laugh and help to eat
