In the fall of 1861 Flag Officer Foote

planned an expedition against Fort Henry, situated on the east bank of the Tennessee river. On the morning of February 2 the fleet left Cairo and in a short time were in the vicinity of the object of attack. Heavy rains had been falling and the river had risen rapidly to an unusual height. The swift running water brought down an unusual amount of driftwood, which caused considerable annoyance to our fleet, but the flood that caused trouble to cur boats also loosened the torpedo boats of the rebels and they all floated down the stream with the driftwood. Soon the fleet was under way and passed slowly up the stream. Shots were soon exchanged between the fleet and the fort. Although the tiring from the fort. The con-federate loss was five killed, eleven wounded and seventy-eight prisoners, the main force, 2600 men, having escaped to Fort Donelson.

The attack on Fort Henry baving been successful, the way was now left open for an advance on Fort Donelson. Gen. Grant's force at Cairo numbered about 30,000 men. while the rebel force of 15,000 men were strongly entrenched at Donelson under command of John B. Floyd. who had been secretary of war during the administration of James Buchan

On the 13th of February there was sharp skirmishing between the advance of the union forces and the fort at which both sides lost about 200 in killed and wounded. On the 14th the gunboats arrived and in the afternoon opened fire and had nearly silenced the batteries of the fort when the steering apparatus of two of the largest boats was shot away and the fleet was forced to withdraw, with a loss of 54 men. In the meantime Gen. Grant was making preparations to invest the fort, when on the morning of February 15 the confederates made a sudden sally, hoping to break through the investment and escape to Nash.
