HUNTING A STILI

By KATHLEEN J. M'CURDY

It was in the days of illicit distilling in Kentucky. A man riding along a road in the eastern part of that state. The reaching a sping farmhouse drew rein the angles. From the crossroads he reaching a snug farmhouse, drew rein. "I'm looking for a farm to buy," he said. "Do you happen to know of any good bit of land about here with some bulldings on lt? "No: I don't," said the woman, who was both young and comely. "There ought to be good farming about here." "Stranger," said the woman, "you hain't looking for farms. You're a revenue man after stills."

The man was astonished. He had supposed he was playing a very successful game.-"If you'd root out the stills the peo-

"Information." "Well, come in and have a snack. Perhaps my husband'll be coming along soon, and he may do something for you." The revenue man dismounted, led his horse to the stable in the rear and entered the house. He chatted with the woman freely about the illicit distilling, said that it helped the few and wronged the many. A district where it was notorious never prospered. It was under a ban; no credit; no production of crops; no comfort for any one. She appeared to agree with him and when he had finished said:

"Did you ever hear of Joe Comstock's still?" "No. I'm a new man; just put on to

"You're a plucky one. The man rode away, following the route exactly as it had been laid down by the woman. He was most of the time climbing a mountain side, and, though the distance was but a few miles, he was two hours getting to a point just beyond which he had been told he would find the Comstock still. He was to recognize it by the crossing was to pass through an opening be tween the trees, go over a stone wall, follow a tunnel a short distance down the mountain and he would come upon the still. Leaving the crossroads, he moved on as directed. He was moving very quietly down the stream when he dislodged a stone that betrayed his approach. He paused, but, hearing nothing, moved forward again. Suddenly he heard the words come out of the darkness, "Hands up!" He knew that he was on an elevation

The revenue man hesitated a mo ent, then thought it best to do as be had been bidden. Suddenly a bullseye lantern was flashed in his face.

"You're not the coward the other one was to come here and surround the place and kill my Joe. You're a brave one if you are a revenue. I'm Miss Joe Comstock, the woman who sent you I knew you were a revenue right off, and since I've been wishing for a chance to get even with you government men I gave you a roundabout way, coming myself straight up the mountains. I intended to kill you, but I couldn't. You're too plucky."

"Well, then, since there is to be no killing, suppose we shake hands and say no more about it"

"You go your way and I go mine Good night." The next afternoon the stranger again rode up to the Widow Comstock's sunded her to give up a still that she had been running ever since her busband had been killed. There was something that took hold of the widow's better side, and lustead of hunting
