LITERARY QUALITIES.

When in any nation an individual is born who is capable of producing a great thought another is born capable of comprehending and admiring it.

Between esteem and contempt there is in literature a path which offers success without glory and is also obtained without merit.

It is worth a hundred times more to a lapt a work to the nature of a human mind than to what is called the state of society. In man there is something inimitable; thence it is that in the acts and works of art there are these fixed rules-beauties that will always please or else contrivances that will please but for a short time.-Joubert.
