

MIXED JUSTICE

Fine Law Protector and Turn Loose the Law Violator

Adam Wilkinson has found it does not do to be a volunteer, that he should be a regular and draw pay if he would protect his fireside.

Many people in the south part of the city have been annoyed by window peepers, and two street hold-ups have occurred within the past month, so Mr. Wilkinson appointed himself a policeman and did patrol duty. Saturday night he watched until midnight and when he started home he fired away any prowlers that might be around.

And immediately the regulars fell upon him, three in number, Long, Surfus and Wyman and he was placed under arrest.

Monday morning he was fined $5 for his volunteer work, and at the same time Clifford Anderson, a stranger, who followed a lady of the city until she was obliged to run into the ice house for protection, was released on suspended sentence.

The man who offended and followed the lady for several blocks was released. The man who did free police duty to protect the lady was arrested and fined, and given a feature story in both city and Portland dailies.

The War Fifty Years Ago

Overtaken by Pursuers at Buffington Island, Ohio River--Seven Hundred Captured in Battle--Morgan Tries to Reach Pennsylvania--A Roundup and Surrender of a Remnant in Northeastern Ohio.

MILITARY conditions at the beginning of August fifty years ago were in strong contrast with those prevailing during the previous three months. In the east and in the west quiet and inactivity of armies were the rule. Only in the camps of the Federals operating against Charleston, S. C., was there a show of vigorous aggression.

The Charleston forces had entered upon a campaign looking to the reduction of Fort Sumter, and although not fighting battles were in contact with the Confederates and were establishing land batteries, also assembling warships, chiefly ironclads, to bombard the city itself as well as its defenses.

In south central Tennessee the Federal army of the Cumberland, led by General W. S. Rosecrans, was slowly forging its way towards the Tennessee river about Chattanooga. The opposing army under General Braxton Bragg was lodged in Chattanooga, prepared to dispute the crossing of the Tennessee and the transfer of hostilities to the soil of Georgia, an event certain to follow upon the Federal capture of the city.

Along the Rappahannock

On Aug. 1 sabers were crossed in an affair of cavalry at the crossings of the Rappahannock west of Fredericksburg. The Confederate horsemen at the Rappahannock crossings constituted a detachment of the rear guard of General R. E. Lee's army, which for two weeks had been retreating from the Potomac to the south bank of the Rappahannock, there to recover from the blows just received at Gettysburg. The pursuit of the retreating Confederates by the Army of the Potomac had been slow and deliberate all the way from Gettysburg. Its commander, General George G. Meade, three days after taking the reins, had entered upon the biggest battle of the war. Having won by a narrow margin a battle which had been forced upon him under conditions not of his own choosing, he felt the necessity of deliberate movements in order that new adjustments of the units and leaders of his command might be made before another campaign opened.

The Federal cavalry on the Rappahannock on Aug. 1 were the division of General John Buford. Buford had been first at Gettysburg. His troopers had sighted the enemy's advance at Gettysburg and stemmed its progress until strong infantry columns reached the field. Buford, with a division of three brigades--Gambler's, Deviss's and Merritt's--led the cavalry vanguard of the Army of the Potomac all the way from Gettysburg to the Potomac and again from the Potomac to the Rappahannock.

At the passes of the Blue Ridge in Virginia Buford encountered cavalry

Hill, whose entire command lay at Culpeper Court House, not far away.

Buford, his men well in hand, forged ahead. The further he went the stiffer the opposition became. Warning shots had been fired at the river early in the morning, and Hill had moved forward with 5,000 infantry and three batteries. Stuart didn't stand to accept fight, but fell back behind the infantry.

When Stuart's troopers retired before the Federal advance they took to the rear all the white citizens and the negroes. The object was to prevent Buford from picking up valuable news. But he learned that Hill was at Culpeper and Lee at Gordonsville, a day's march farther on. One of Buford's dispatches said that he had been "driving the enemy all day," but they were growing in numbers. "I can't fight so many," he reported.

Finally orders reached Buford to fall back near the river and cover the engineers who were constructing the railroad bridge. He was instructed to look to the infantry to hold what had been gained. Lee moved all his force to the river bank within two days.

Hostile Sioux Dispersed.

In July fifty years ago Minnesota war volunteers took the field to punish a tribe of the Sioux who were pillaging and murdering in their state. One year previous the Indians had committed massacres in Minnesota settlements, but in 1833 their outrages took the form of occasional murders of isolated bands.

The savages came over from Dakota by stealing past the frontier guards in small companies. They approached within a few miles of St. Paul. As the great body of Sioux were in Dakota, General H. H. Sibley, who was in immediate command in the northwest, decided to cross the border and expel them from his district. The expeditionary force comprised the First Minnesota cavalry and the Sixth, Seventh and Tenth infantry volunteers, with the Third Minnesota battery.

The hostiles in the field numbered about 2,000. Their movements were believed to be instigated by emissaries in Canada who wanted to make trouble for the United States. The Indians were led by a son of Chief Little Crow, a troublesome hostile who had recently met his death at the hands of a white settler on Minnesota soil.

A cavalry column led by General Alfred Sully, an experienced Indian fighter, set out from Sioux City to march up the Missouri river. By rapid movements this body might get in the rear of the Indians while Sibley pressed them in front.

Indian Treachery.

Sibley's column overtook the savages the last week in July at Big Mound, Dak. A parley was offered, to which the Indians assented. As soon as the whites entered the camp their spokesman was shot dead, and Sibley sent forward a battalion of cavalry with two companies of the Seventh regiment.

The Sioux were soon driven from the hill by the superior weapons of the Minnesotans. Two days later the expedition was encamped ten miles farther on, at Dead Buffalo lake. Late in the day a band of mounted Sioux dashed up the grazing camp to cut loose the animals. They were met and put to flight by a charge of Sibley's cavalry. After this failure the savages circled the camp looking for a weak point to attack, but finally retired without opposition, with infantry in reserve, but he brushed them all aside and concentrated his force preparatory to picking up the Rappahannock from Sulphur Springs on the west to Kelly's Ford on the east.

Cavalry Afloat.

General Meade had sent forward to the river strong detachments of infantry to co-operate with the cavalry in laying pontoon bridges at Kelly's ford and Rappahannock station. This work was preliminary to the construction of a railroad bridge at Rappahannock station. The latter would extend from the river to the Potomac, and would follow the route of the Potomac and the Rappahannock rivers.

Buford found over 100 abandoned wagons on the eastern bank and other evidences that the hostiles were in final retreat westward. Having exhausted its supplies, the expedition was forced to return to Minnesota.

General Sully's command did not reach the scene of operations until a month after Sibley had marched east. It encountered a large body of Sioux, including some of Sibley's opponents. In a sanguinary battle the Indians were again defeated.
