How John Stark Looks at the Proposed Currency Measure

"We are about to set them free. We must not leave them without the tools of action when they are free."

I should like to give you the full speech, but it would require a full column. You see he pleads for the "bus-iness men." Throughout the whole of it no mention is made of the farmer, producer in any capacity is not mentioned once. No notice is served by gation of law-makers, composed, if not exclusively of the parasitic class, at least overwhelmingly so, that the toilers of this land shall be freed from the extoritions of the money leader.

But why should they concern themselves when the workers are not enough interested in their own wellenough interested in their own well-fare to go to Congress, but surrender their votes to their economic enemies. None of those saviors of the majority were concerned about the most numerous class of workers, namely the farmers, where they faced foreclosfarmers, where they faced foreclosure on mortgage or personal debts, but why should they, for if the farmer had that the subject important he would have bimself gone to look of the farmer had the subject important he would have bimself gone to look of the farmer had the subject important he would have bimself gone to look of the farmer had the farmer had the farmer had been subject in favor of Doan's Kidney Pills and they removed my trouble. Not long ago Mann said, that the currency measure before the Senate would produce the worst panic the country has ever seen. I say let her pound, having had over a half century of panies, mostly under the Re-
