guards to tell us to watch our steps. Wherever there is danger, wherever there is peril of our feet slipping and straying from the right path, we may hear, if we are willing to listen, the same cry as that which saves the subway passenger: "Watch your step!"

Sometimes the warning is shouted out so that all men and women may hear it. Sometimes it is the still, small voice within us that warns us to keep our feet from evil. Sometimes we hear the admonition in the voices of relatives and friends, but more often it comes from within, from the sense, divinely planted, which tells us when peril is near.

In the subway the cry is not always heeded. The passenger, overzealous to get ahead, to reach his destination, hurries too fast to make his train, and he slips between the station and the car.

Then there is hurrying to and fro and excitement until he is assisted to his feet. Sometimes he does not get out in time; the train starts; the rest is too horrible to dwell upon.

All because he did not watch his step. Had he done so he would not have been taken, maimed or lifeless, to the hospital or the morgue.

It pays to watch your step. It pays to be careful where one places his feet. It does not pay to fall between the cars, for even if the train does not start and grind one's flesh beneath the sharp wheels there is always delay, not only to the overzealous traveler himself, but to the whole line of passengers who wish to ride on the same train.

We all ride on the train of life. Whatever retards one delays another. For the sake of your fellow travelers, as well as yourself, be not overzealous to get ahead regardless of consequences. When you travel along the broad highway on which we all must go—

"Watch your step!"
