Philosopher And King

By F. A. MITCHEL

There was once a boy who was born a prodigy. When he was twelve years old he could dispute with the most learned philosophers and when he was sixteen employed much of his leisure time in working out military problems as some persons in these days contend with an imaginary enemy at chess,

He would set up imaginary enemies, only to attack and overwhelm them. Then be would set them up again and conquer them by another method of

This boy's name was Paulus, and he was destined to accomplish great feats. Indeed, from the time he was five years old he seemed imbued with this idea. During his youth his only intimate friend was a philosopher named enes, placing small value on anything goes up," he said, "must come down. ruin when it falls."

But Paulus being young this pessimistic statement had little effect upon him. "I feel," he said, "an impulse to climb and climb. I will, and I shall accumulate power as I rise. The higher I climb the greater my power. cannot escape death in the end, but can establish myself so strongly that I shall die at the summit of my career.'

When Paulus was twenty years old a war broke out between his countrymen and a neighboring kingdom. In this war Paulus so distinguished himself that he was made a general. All the other generals on his side were whipped, but l'aulus by his genius made up for all their defeats and with his own army alone conquered a peace.

He was then transferred from the army to the king's cabinet, and soon by his recommendations gained so much credit that he was made prime minister. The king meanwhile was growing old and relied more and more on Paulus. Xanthus, the prince who would inherit the crown, was a weak-Hng, and the king, realizing that after his own death Paulus would be the only man able to protect the country against its enemies, gave him the hand of his daughter in marriage that he might reign as king.

When the king died the people insisted on l'aulus and his wife assuming the reins of government, and Paulus yielded. He became king, and, since the presence of the legal heir to the throne was not desirable, he was banished.

Paulus then began a career of con-quest, by which he subdued many neighboring kingdoms. When they were all brought under subjection he called his old friend Heraclitus to him and said:

"Behold my power. I am now an emperor instead of a king. I have accomplished all I set out to accomplish. It now remains to be seen whether I shall retain what I have or

"The stone that is thrown in the air must come down," replied the philosopher. "In your youth you were strong. You have passed the building up of our powers, and from this point you will begin a process of decay. "I have provided against that," replied Paulus. "I am so strongly intrenched that my enemies cannot prevail against me."

For several years all went well, and Paulus again sent for the philosopher and said to him: "Am I not as powerful as ever?" "No," replied Heraclitus. "You are in the position of the stone when it has finished its ascent and before it begins to fall." "What will be the cause of my fall?"

"Nothing in nature stands still. If we are not advancing we are retrograding.

The king dismissed his old friend with sorrow, for he felt that vigor had gone out of him. If called upon to defend his empire from enemies he could not do what he had done in building it up.

Meanwhile Cheros, the son of Xanthus, had been growing to manhood in exile and in the knowledge that his father was king and he helr presump tive to the throne. His father's death was the signal for him to begin secretly to dissatisfy the peoples that King Paul had brought under his sway. The prince had the advantage of legitimacy, and he not only pleaded this, but promised the conquered that if they would make him emperor he would give them their freedom. Here was an opportunity that had not been given them before. The conquered peoples formed a league to de throne Paulus and put Cheros on the throne. When all was ready the bolt was shot. Paulus, now an old man, put himself at the bead of his armies, but be had lost the courage of youth and finding his joints stiff, was not only unable to lead, but to keep pace with his subordinate commander. He was beaten in one battle after another and at last obliged to fiee in order to save his life. Being hunted, he sought safety in an island where were no human be ings except himself. His only companlons were the beasts.

One person only visited him there. his old friend the philosopher. "Do you come to triumph over me in that your prophesies have come true?"

asked the exile. "No: I come because you are the same to me as you have always been A stone going up in the air, resting at the summit of its are, falling or the ground is still a stone."
