OREGON WOOL MEN MAKE PROGRESS

Several of the large woolen and worsted manufacturers who this year for the first time in the history of Oregon, were able to buy commercially graded valley wools from the Pacific cooperative wool growers, have expressed themselves as well pleased with the brands offered, and the association's methods of doing business. One large eastern manufacturer states that he was particularly well pleased with the way the wools which were bought from the association were put up, and stated that he would be glad to buy 5,000,000 pounds of one grade from the growers in 1922.

Another manufacturer who operates three large western mills, speaking to Manager R. A. Ward, said: "I should think it would be a revelation to valley wool growers to have their wools graded and handled in this manner. This is the first time I have had the opportunity to buy graded valley wools, and I am well pleased with your grades and the quality of the wools offered. In the past, I have been forced in buying valley wools, to buy everything in an ungraded condition, and as I use chiefly only three eights and quarter blood grades, I naturally had to buy lots of wools that were of no particular value to me, in order to get what I wanted. I believe your members can grow as good wools as they grow in Michigan if they will have them graded and prepared for market in the manner that you have handled them this season. In the past, these wools, while good, have been prepared for market in such an abominable fashion that when buying direct from farmers or leaders, we took considerable chances. It appears to me that the educational value to the association's grading of these wools will mean many thousands of dollars each year to the wool growers of Oregon."

Another mill man, representing perhaps the largest woolen mill on the Pacific coast, which bought heavily from the Pacific cooperative growers, during 1921, stated that he would much prefer to buy the graded wools, particularly when he could inspect them in the warehouse, and select just the kind of wool which he desired for some special line of fabrics. He went on to relate how in the past, when he desired to purchase only quarter blood wool, he was forced to buy it from the country wool dealers in the original ungraded condition, and that as a result, he always received several thousand pounds of grades of wool which his mill could not use. This general unsatisfactory method of buying wool made it necessary to pay lower prices to farmer when buying these ungraded wools out in the country.

During 1921, over forty million pounds of wool was marketed cooperatively in the United States by wool marketing associations in some fifteen states. Other wool states are now preparing to adopt this method of marketing wool during the coming season as it is generally recognized by progressive wool growers that only by the orderly marketing of graded wools direct to mills throughout the entire season, can fair and just prices for wools be received.
