Meantime the main body of the hostiles was still ghost dancing and howling through the wintry night far over to the north among the breaks and chasms of the Bad Lands, so strong in numbers and so secure from assault within the lines of their natural fortress as to laugh to scorn all premonition of disaster. Runners had gone to every tribe urging concerted action and united revolt. Every day brought new accessions, and all that was needed to enable them to bid defiance to the encircling force was the arrival of the great bands that had broken away from the reservations along the Missouri, followers and would be avengers of the old chieftain. Sitting Bull, who had died in harness, a rebel to the last. Brule and Ogallala. Uncpapa and Minneconjou—here were the warriors, re-enforced by many a new grown son, who had fought the white soldiers summer after summer, time and again, in the bloody days of the decade past—the Brules especially, once restrained by the wisdom of old Sintogaliska, now ripe for any deviltry and well nigh unanimous for war to the knife.

Without noteworthy incident, Berrien's command had circled around to the east of the sacred lines of the reservation, had spent a day or two exploring the breaks and ravines of a dozen little streams flowing into the Wapka Washtay, had located trail after trail of travois, pony and lodge pole tracks, had scoured the wide valley of the main stream, but without sight of a single warrior, much less a war party. The still smoking ruins of two ranches told, however, of recent visitation, and the hoof marks of cattle mingling with the pony tracks pointed unerringly whither the spoil had been driven. Meantime, while nothing could be seen of the wily red man, every hour gave new proof that their own movements were closely observed. Signal smokes went puffing skyward on almost every side, and the night sentries declared that twice just before dawn of two successive mornings they had dimly seen shadowy horsemen darting over the neighboring ridges and had heard the thud of nimble hoofs. Even in the faded gray of the bunch grass, even on the hard frozen ground, experienced eyes could find corroboration of the story.

Almost in the face of the foremost Sioux his revolver blazes its challenge.

During Indian scouts were ever on their flanks and front and rear, making no overt move against them, but keeping the hostile camp fully informed of everything that was being done and watching restlessly for opportunity to cut off every straying charger, to cut down every straggling man. Knowing all this full well, Berrien had given strict orders—neither officer nor trooper was permitted to leave the column by day nor the bivouac by night; and now its mission accomplished, the column had started on return march, and up to this time no casualty had occurred. So long as the isolated battalion was moving toward the hostile camp, bearing every hour the overwhelming array of the enemy and separating itself farther and farther from friendly supports, no bar had been put to its progress. But now the Indian scouts could see that it was turning back, probably in the hope of regaining the cantonment un molested.

It was a sunshiny December afternoon; the air was as clear as a bell, the clouds that obscured the eastern sky at dawn had long since drifted out of sight, and in all its broad expanse the pale blue vault of the heavens were not so much as a feather of vapor. Who that rode in the laughing, chatting, jaunty column that sparkling day could realize the change a few hours might effect on the silent, breezeless solitudes around them? At noon the sun was so warm that many a trooper had stripped off his heavy overcoat and turned up the flaps of the rough fur cap. Except in deep ravines hardly any snow was to be seen. The dull gray surface of the rolling prairie, wave after wave, lay basking, and the leafless branches of the cottonwoods overhanging the frozen pools were glistening, sparkling in the life giving rays. The advance guard, after breaking the ice and treating their horses to a mouthful of water at the stream, had moved on at brisk trot, and now the stalwart riders were spreading out in extended order as they breasted the slope. Out to the west, full five hundred yards, the wary flankers could be seen, some crossing the stream farther down the valley, while other comrades appeared over the barren ridge behind, that no sneaking foe might crawl up unobserved and send a long range bullet from his shelter down into the swarm of troopers at the ford. So, too, the flankers to the east and the sturdy little knot of rear guardsmen just popping up over the divide so recently crossed, all told of ceaseless vigilance on every side. Berrien had not ridden the Sioux trail a score of years for nothing. He takes no chances where the security of his command is concerned, and has small opinion of the leader who subjects them to needless risk.

And now one after another the four troops ride into close column on the northward bank; the men dismount, unsaddle, and presently, with side lines in hand, each trooper leading his faithful steed, the four herds are guided to the separate grazing grounds already chosen and "pre-empted" by wide awake subalterns or sergeants. There the side lines are carefully adjusted, the bridles slipped off, three or four men remain in saddle as herd guard and the horses are left to graze. Rich with nutriment is that crisp, dry bunch grass—rich and plentiful. The mules of the pack train bray with impatience to shed their loads and join their envied four footed comrades, but presently they, too, following the bell, are streaming out upon the guarded prairie, rolling in luxury upon the frosty earth and kicking their legs in air in genuine delight. From a dozen little fires among the bare limbed cottonwoods the thin smoke is curling aloft, and the rattle of tin cup and plate and the jovial voices of the men seem to clamor for their soldier rations. In long rows the saddles and equipments were aligned upon the turf, each man's carbine and belt at his saddle. Huge rolls of robes and blankets are unstrapped and spread to air, and all this time, while the troop officers are looking to the comfort and security of their horses, Major Berrien, followed by a single orderly, is riding about from point to point to satisfy himself that the guards are stationed where best they can secure the bivouac against surprise.

The ridge to the southwest is higher than those which limit the view at other points, and thither Berrien is now riding at easy lope. Rolfe and Hazlett, watching him for a moment, exchange an appreciative nod as they hear from the group of soldiers at the nearest camp fire some brawny son of the old red mark. "Just luck at the old man now; sure it's a smart redskin that will ever get through the pickets he posts." Not since the days of old "Major Slowtrot," old "Pap" Thomas, has there been a battalion commander better loved by the rank and file. They know nothing will ever induce him to forget one precaution for their safety, and reward his care with a loyalty of devotion good to see. Watching him still further, Hazlett notes that a distant vedette has signaled, and that Berrien, slowly now, is riding up the slope to join him. A sergeant has some question to ask at the moment, and when Hazlett again looks out to the southwest, major, orderly and vedette have disappeared from view around a little shoulder of bluff. Other vedettes can be seen at their posts on all sides, and a few dismantled sentries lying prone where, unseen themselves, they can scan the country to their front. But Hazlett's curiosity is excited by the fact that two men, mere specks in the distance, are huddling together at the crest half a mile away to the southwest and evidently watching something out at their front and motioning to the sergeant back with the supports. Presently this trooper, too, trots out to join them. Berrien and his party are still out of sight from camp. "Captain, may I borrow your field-glasses?" asked Mr. Brewster, swinging up to the fire where Hazlett stands. "I have lent mine to the sergeant of the guard." "Did you see where the major went?" asks Hazlett by way of reply, as he hands the desired instrument. "I last saw him at the point yonder. He rode around it with Sergeant Ellis and a couple of men, and that vedette must have been calling to him. It seems to me they've been gone some time; so Gorham says I can ride out and find out what it means." "I'd go with you, Brewster, but my horse is out at herd. Take the glasses with you, anyhow." Brewster's big black is led up at the moment, and the lieutenant quickly mounts and canters easily away. Meantime, old Berrien, who has noted the signals of the vedette referred to, has joined him, with the brief inquiry, "What is it, Scott?" "Why, sir, I was posted here by the sergeant, and he had no sooner gone than I saw what I took to be horsemen in the valley several miles out yonder to the southwest. The major can see the whole country from a butte that lies perhaps three hundred yards farther out beyond this ridge. But here comes the sergeant back, sir."

It is Ellis, cantering briskly from the advanced position Scott has designated, and coming to them now around the shoulder of the bluff a little to the right. That Ellis has seen something is evident; his face shows it in an instant. "An Indian war party, major, perhaps a dozen, rode from behind a long ridge over to the west and down into the valley of what I take to be a branch of the Porcupine. That butte hides a good deal of the valley; but we can see it from there, though."

"You three men come with me," says Berrien quietly. "We must look into this."

Apples are being exported in large quantities. Oregon alone will send to market this season 50,000 head of beef cattle in unusually prime condition. The breeding and handling of live horses is a proper branch of the live stock industry, but it is one that the average farmer should let severely alone. It is a business that should be engaged in only by men of ample means, who are able to stand large losses; but it has a tempting aspect when we learn that a single horse farm near Lexington, Ky., had an income of about $200,000 last year. This amount included the sale of stock and the earnings of five stallions.—Nebraska State Journal.

The geese has become such a thoroughly domesticated bird that it will now thrive without any large body of water to swim in. Yarded geese may be made quite profitable with good care and feed.
