"Why will she not trust me and tell me about it—she who used to have no secret from me? We know that he was deeply in love with her and that she was believed to care for him, but there was a fearful scene between him and Mr. Guthrie over poor Jack's body. The old gentleman was wild with grief, and in his misery he upbraided Worden as the cause of it all-accused him of being the thief and cursed him for concealing the crime at the expense of Jack's life and honor. Possibly he did believe it then, but since Percival's death everything is changed. I believe he would give all he owns to make amends to Worden now, and sometimes I think that that is what is killing Nita." "That that is what is killing Nita," read Holden again, this time half aloud, as he pondered over the word. Then a sound at the door attracted him. He glanced up quickly. "Oh, come in, sergeant. I did not hear you knock."

"And yet you yourself do not pick up as I could wish. Take that chair, Ellis; we shall not be interrupted, and I want to talk with you about your case. You have won honor and troops of friends in this campaign, and when the regiment gets back and they find you pale and languid, so utterly unlike yourself and unfit to take your duties as first sergeant, they will say I was at fault. Can't stand that, you know, so I have spoken to Major Kenyon about the matter, and he has directed that you move out of the hospital forthwith and under my roof. Not keep your seat. You are to report to me for special duty in making up the field papers and reports, and I shall need you right here where I can supervise it all and look after you."

For a moment the two men sat gazing straight into each other's eyes. Then again, trembling slightly, Ellis strove to

"Dr. Holden, I-1 ought not to take advantage of this. Indeed I cannot."

"That will do, sir," was the quietly smiling reply. "Orders are orders, ser-geant, and being a patient you are doubly under mine. What's more, you can ask no question until that chevron is replaced by the shoulder strap. Ellis, under what name shall the officers of the Twelfth ask that you be made one of their number?"

Making no reply, the sergeant bowed his head and covered his face with his

Late that evening old Kenyon, drepping in to see the doctor, found the tall cavalryman seated at a desk in Holden's library, and, as he promptly arose and stood erect in acknowledgment of the presence of the post commander, the major strode straight up to him and held out his hand:

'Sergeant, I am as proud and pleased as your own father could be. When a whole regiment recommends a man for a commission, as this day's mail tells us, it's worth more than all the senatorial backing in Columbia. It may not fetch it, but I'd rather have it. Now, have you any friends to aid you?" "None in the world, sir.

'No relatives? No kin? Not even a Yambill, 4,319,691 congressman?"

"Not even a congressman. A sister, perhaps: but that is all."
