OUR BOYS' ENTERTAINMENT.

Full House and Good Play but of No Benefit to Company F.

A more surprised lot than the members of Company F it would be hard to find anywhere in the state when they learned that from a house bringing in over $125 they were to receive nothing but were actually in debt. The play was all that could have been expected, all who took part having acted extremely well, but instead of being managed so as to give the militia company a benefit it seems to have been worked for the benefit of individuals not members of Co. F. The box sheet indicated that the receipts of the evening should have been $126.00, but the amount actually accounted for was $121.25, while the expense as per the bills rendered was $122.10 or 85 cents more than the receipts. Those who have examined the bills state that such items as cigars and wine are contained therein. As the ladies do not use these articles it will be in order for some one to explain.

TEACHERS' COLUMN

All communications for this column should be sent to H. S. STARKWEATHER, Milwaukee, Oregon.

SCHOOL DISCIPLINE.

The request of the editor of the educational column that the address delivered by the undersigned on the above named subject at the last session of the Clackamas County Educational association be published cannot be complied with for the reason that the major portion of said address has not been reduced to writing and it was too lengthy to be administered to teachers through this column except in broken doses. However I will undertake to reproduce a few of the thoughts advanced, not in the vain hope that their repetition will be of much benefit to the writer or to his professional friends, but with the hope that teachers may be led to think, read, talk and write on the subject, and in this way our profession can be materially benefited.

It seems unnecessary to dwell upon the importance of school discipline. The teacher hears it from the platform and reads it in bold letters in every educational paper. He knows that without order and attention the school is a failure, hence it should be a waste of time and strength to be continually emphasizing this and similar well established principles. The why is known, the how to many is unknown.

In disciplining a school, the importance of the first day cannot be over estimated. Children are good readers of human nature, and are likely to form judgments at the first of the school that will last. The teacher should be ready for the first day, and so commence his work that there can be no mistaken ideas formed as to his ability to teach and to govern.

Next in importance to the opening work I would consider the discipline at recesses. This, very frequently, is a puzzling subject. In some of our city schools it is solved by dispensing with recesses altogether, except the noon intermission. In others, basements are arranged so that pupils can be marched down into them and for a few minutes rest from class work, and by vigorous healthful exercise be strengthened for renewed efforts, while the rooms and halls are being thoroughly ventilated.

But in the country or the town school, where basements are either not known, or used in lieu of wood sheds, teachers will either have to march their pupils outside into the rain or cold, or let them remain in the rooms or halls, or dispense with recesses altogether. Public sentiment is not favorable to dispensing with recesses, hence I will proceed as if a recess about the middle of the morning, and of the afternoon session is a necessity.

Happy is the country teacher who has a good playground on which his pupils can engage in healthful, joyous sports, which the teacher should carefully supervise. Let me add that the teacher should be with his pupils enough during the recess to see that they indulge in nothing improper, either in language, games or conduct.

In our damp climate there is much of the time when pupils can not be expected to leave the rooms or the halls at recess. What will you do then? The windows should be raised and lowered and the air of the rooms thoroughly changed.

Will you ask pupils to either pass out into the rain or cold, or remain seated in such a draft during the few minutes recess? The man that would do so brutal to deal with children. Pupils under such circumstances should be permitted to move about in the room or in the halls talking, laughing and enjoying themselves in a lady-like and gentlemanly manner. While they are resting from their tasks, be sure to prohibit scuffling, or racing or any boisterous or rough conduct.

Circumstances must very largely govern the regulations necessary for recesses, what would work in one place, or in one school house might not be best in another.

This general principle may be laid. Supervise your pupils at recesses whether they are on the play ground or in the school room. Allowing privileges enough for an agreeable and restful change from class work and making such regulations as your school building, the weather and your pupils require.

With these common place thoughts on the importance of the first day and the discipline of the recess, I close for the present. H. S. STRANGE.

The Time For Pruning.

Pruning may be done at any time when the trees are not in full leaf. Whether it should be done in the fall, in open weather during the winter, or in spring depends upon the convenience of the pruner. Trees and vines that are only half hardy should not be pruned so closely in the fall as would be proper in spring. The cut is porous and admits cold, which the closer bark of the tree would exclude. Some prune apple trees late in the spring in order to prevent sap sprouts where the branches are cut out. This practice injures the thrift of the trees, but it may be advisable for young orchards that grow too much wood and do not bear fruit as they should. The check which late spring pruning gives to such trees induces the formation of fruit buds, and the trees will bear the year after. But the better way with most trees. The American Cultivator thinks, is to prune when the buds are dormant and rub out the sprouts when they have grown a few inches in spring. There is less check to the tree in this way, but enough to make it more productive than it would otherwise be.

Plenty of water and abundance of shade are a strong combination against sickness among fowls in hot weather.
