Perhaps the most romantic spot on all this hill top is Jacob Thomson's place situated directly back of and adjoining J. S. McCord's pasture lands. Formerly it was taken as a soldier's grant by William F. Brayton, now of Maple Lane. Here he proceeded to build a home among the giant sixth birthday by invitation, and right royally was she treated by the mistress of the house who understood how to make that same little girl happy. But now the face of the country is all changed. The giant firs that stretched out their arms toward infinity have long since been converted into long lines of filmy smoke, and stone fences now occupy the space that was once usurped by riotous bazel and vining maple. Along the uncultivated steeps the dogwood and brake still continue to cling. There are many points of interest to be seen from this alpine eminence, with Mt.
