HOW TO MAKE A MICROPHONE.

A Simple Instrument by Which a Fly Can Be Heard to Walk.

Within the telephone is a wonderful little instrument called a microphone. By its means sound can be magnified to unheard proportions. The microphone is a very simple instrument indeed. Three ordinary round nails and a square piece of wood will form a very good microphone. Two of the nails are laid parallel to but not touching each other. The third nail is laid across the first two, which are connected in circuit with a battery and a telephone receiver. The nails of course are laid on the flat, square piece of wood, which acts as a sounding board and transmits to the nails any vibration which may take place upon it.

Every sound is reproduced exactly as It is made, except that it is much magnified. When a fly performs its toilet, the rasping of the nami legs against the wings or the rubbing of the atenum may be distinctly heard. The buzzing of the insect makes a terrific noise When, for instance, a fly, contined in in a pasteboard box, attempts to walk around his prison, the vibration caused by his movements is conveyed through the sounding board to the nails, which, in their turn, interfere with the perfect passage of the electric current as it travels across the places where they rest upon each other. A large vibration produces a correspondingly large sound in the telephone, and so on down to the smallest degree of minuteness. The principle of the action of the instrument depends on the interruption 530 of an electric current which passes through the telephone. The apparatus for this interruption in so delicately poised that any sound will cause a vibration accurately reproduced in the telephone. The method given above is the very crudest form in which a microphone may be made. Those which are manufactured for commercial or experimental use are very exact affairsdelicately adjusted and arranged to work with screws at the highest point of efficiency.

How to Prevent Sickness Caused by Motion on Land or Sea

Seasickness, as it is always termed, is caused by a rolling about of the inner parts of the body-the vital parts and intestines-a shaking or disturbance. Now, a simple remedy for that dreadful malady is to get a couple of sheets of ordinary foolscap paper and place them over your breast and stomach, binding them on with a wide bandage of cloth, linen preferably, long enough to go quite around the body, all this, of course, under all clothing. This has been tried with good results by
