THE ENCAMPMENT.

livered a formal address of welcome to Commander-in-Chief Lawler and said that a soldier's welcome was a cordial welcome; he gave also a special reason why the welcome was accorded to General Lawler the fact that he is the first commander-in-chief who has ever visited an encampment of the Oregon department. He showed why a soldier's greeting meant more than an ordinary greeting, and facing General Lawler said: "Sir, no king upon his throne can hope for such a welcome as you receive, unless the valor of his deeds and the nobility of his character should equal yours."

He spoke of the dignity and honor attaching to the position held by General Lawler, and paid a glowing tribute to the army and navy and to the great Union leaders. This was followed by an equally beautiful word of praise concerning woman's work in and after the war, culminating in the W. R. C., and still another eulogy concerning the Sons of Veterans. The peroration, in which the speaker set forth the necessity of having the younger generation trained to meet emergencies as their fathers had been was a model of forensic eloquence, closing with the assurance to General Lawler that though other encampments might have accorded him a more showy and elegant reception, yet none could give him a truer or more loyal greeting than the one extended him tonight.

When Commander-in-Chief Lawler arose to deliver the address of the evening all eyes were riveted with the closest attention, and cheer after cheer burst forth with spontaneous fervor, and it was several moments before the general was able to proceed with his address. His speech was grand, and the veterans imbibed the sentiments conveyed in every sentence, phrase and word. It is impossible here to do justice to the commander's address. It was cool, vigorous, sublime, patriotic, interspersed with humorous anecdotes, told with inimitable drollery, and often touched the cords of pathos. He said he had visited thirty-five encampments, during the present official year, thus far, and had not received a warmer welcome anywhere than here, and further said: "You may be small in numbers, but you are valiant." He paid a grand tribute to the army of the Potomac, from his standpoint as a Western man, and told how when an army was defeated, the difficulty experienced in getting them into fighting trim again, but they always get back to the same standard of valor. General Lawler told the veterans present that they were part and parcel of that great army made up of the flower of the country; that they looked younger than the veterans in the Eastern states, but he accounted for this from the fact that only the stronger and healthier men sent West. But he added, "We are growing old and the grand army will soon have passed away." He spoke of the tie of fraternalism that exists between the soldiers that fought on the battlefield, as being closer and stronger than the ties that bind the members of any other organization. General Lawler addressed a word to the citizens present who were not G. A. R. men, in which he said: "We are not the conservators of all patriotism, but you owe us the honor of saving the country." After eulogizing Lincoln and Grant, he asserted that every man who served in the war had his life shortened from ten to fifteen years, by reason of the exposure and hardships endured. He claimed that the men who had once been granted pensions, ought not to have the same cancelled without due process of law; that a good soldier invariably made a good citizen; that the G. A. R. was broad in its work and countenanced no political faith or religious belief; that it was a shame that any man by a ruling can cut off the pension of a soldier in his old age; that the abolition of slavery did more to elevate labor than any organization has since; we were soldiers from necessity, not from choice—when the war was over we became the best of citizens; the Women's Relief Corps was organized in 1883, and he had watched their work as well as that of the G. A. R.; had noticed how much they had lightened the burdens of the veterans, and that during the war the women at home had suffered more than the soldiers; there was no excitement of battle to revive their drooping spirits and they waited for days, months and even years in suspense for the end of the war; had it not been for the women many of the soldiers would have laid down their guns; reputation's sake kept many of us in the field. He further complimented the women on their work, and eulogized the flag.

Col. C. C. Jones, adjutant-general of the national department, gave some figures concerning the work they were doing. With General Lawler they had already visited thirty-five state encampments, and expect to have visited forty by the end of the present fiscal year. In their trip through the south they discovered that the people were awakening to the true spirit of patriotism; that the governor of North Carolina, says it is his intention to have a flag on every school house in the state. His statistics showed that there were 371,000 G. A. R. men in good standing in the United States, and that the plan of re-instating the worthy delinquents on the roll was having a tendency to prevent the death roll from decreasing the membership so rapidly.

Comrade Baldwin of Matthew Post, gave a new version of "Marching Through Georgia," which fairly brought down the house. He said it was easier to sing the song than to do the marching. Comrade West of Bandon Post, No. 26, presented Commander Lawler a myrtle wood gavel, with the compliments of the post. Comrade Jones of Florence Post, exhibited a couple of samples of hard tack that he had saved from his last rations in 1865, which attracted some attention, and evoked some good-natured comment. During the afternoon and evening exercises, the past state department commanders of the G. A. R., and past state presidents of the W. R. C., were in attendance: Past Commanders—G. E. Caulkins, A. E. Borthwick, J. C. Cooper and O. Summers. Past presidents—Mrs. E. G. Caulkins of Portland, Mrs. Julia Abraham of Roseburg, Mrs. Babcock of Salem and Mrs. S. S. Train of Albany.

The business men and residents generally, of Oregon City deserve special mention for the expense and taste displayed in decorating the business houses as well as private dwellings, and they vied with each other in this respect. Never before was Oregon City decorated in such grand style as on this occasion, all the visitors were loud in their praise of the tasty display of bunting, colors and flags. The arch across the street at the corner of Main and Fifth was the center of attraction, with its tasty designs of lettering, emblems, flags and bunting, splendidly lit up with electric incandescent lights at night time. The top of the arch was surmounted with an imitation drum on which were inscribed the letters "G. A. R." on both sides. On the center of the arch stretching across the street was the word "Welcome" in large letters, while below on one side extending obliquely "W. R. C." stood out prominently and on the other side lettered the same way, was painted "S. of V." Hanging in graceful folds from the center and sides of the arch was the large flag of Battery A, which is 56x80 feet in size. The decoration of the arch was under the immediate supervision of Mr. A. G. White, who deserves due credit for his work. Notable among the decorations worthy of special mention, were St. John's school, Sheriff Maddock's residence, Mayor Straight's store, W. A. Huntley had a neat representation of a tent in his book store window, as also did J. W. O'Connell at the cigar store, and Charman & Co's drug store. In fact, all of the buildings were handsomely decorated. C. E. Bailey, the pharmacist in Harding's drug store had one of the show windows neatly ornamented with crystals, with the background filled with blue sulphate of copper, and on a square bed of white formed of white sulphate of magnesia, were the letters, "G. A. R." made out of red bichromate of potash. The design was tasty and attracted much attention. Women's Relief Corps headquarters at the K. of P. hall, G. A. R. headquarters at Pope's hall, Sons of Veterans headquarters at the M. E. church, where a part of the exercises was held, were all tastily and profusely arrayed in colors, emblems, flags and flowers. Charman & Son's store was one of the most elegantly decorated establishments in the city, and deserves notice.

DECORATIONS.

The executive committee, Capt. J. P. Shaw, chairman, deserve special mention for their work in making the encampment a grand success. The program in its multitudinous details was carried out with scarcely a hitch, and the visiting delegations were loud in their praise of the way in which they were entertained by the people. But the executive committee did not do all the work, they were assisted by other committees, who labored diligently to make the encampment the grandest success of any ever held in Oregon and it was so pronounced by the visitors. Following is the personnel of the various committees, who assiduously and harmoniously pulled together for one common purpose: Executive committee—Messrs. J. P. Shaw, J. T. Apperson, George A. CAMP LAWLER. Thirty-eight representatives of Castor Post and Women's Relief Corps at McMinnville, and four G. A. R. representatives from Sheridan, under direction of Past Department Commander J. C. Cooper, came down on the steamer Toledo from Dayton Monday morning, and went into camp on the west side of the river, and just across the road from Battery A's camp at the end of the suspension bridge. There were fourteen ladies in camp, and one of the comrades in giving an account of their experiences on the trip, said they boarded the boat at Dayton Sunday evening, but as there were only ten vacant berths on the boat, an apartment was made out of a tent stretched across the ladies' cabin, that served as a bed chamber for four of the ladies. The comrades spread their blankets wherever they could find a place under tables and against the wall, or wherever an available spot presented itself. They had a jolly time, and during the night some of them playfully stole blankets from their sleeping comrades, and the narrator stated that when he awoke from his slumbers in the morning his blankets were gone, and all that he could find of his clothing was a coat. At a way landing on the trip down, a cow was led on board, and in a very short time, some of the veterans were up to their old tricks, and had milked the cow dry.

Battery A, O. N. G., under command of Captain Greenleaf, had a scenic camping place at the west end of the suspension bridge. Some time previous, arrangements had been made to go into camp for three days at the G. A. R. encampment, to gain what benefit could be derived from a brief season of camp duty, the absence of a general encampment of the national guard this summer. Regular camp military drill was strictly carried out. At sunrise in the mornings the buglers played the reveille, after which came roll call, toilet, breakfast, gun drill and fatigue duty. They were provided with two gaiting guns and two field pieces, and in the forenoon Monday put in the time at target practice, saber and gun drills. The morning guns on Tuesday awoke the whole town and the forty-two soldiers hustled out in a hurry to prepare for the day's work. Considerable time was taken up with target practice with the regulation 38-calibre artillery revolvers. Many visits were paid the camp during the day by citizens and members of the Grand Army of the Republic. General C. F. Beebe and Majors H. E. Mitchell and L. C. Jones of the brigade staff, paid the camp an official visit, on a pleasant tour of inspection. He was received with all the honors of war, and as the salute of 11 guns reverberated across the valley it marked the first military salute that
