prunes, pears, cherries, etc., has greatly increased within the last few years, California fruit growers have been in the habit of buying up our "forties and fifties," prones that run that number to the pound, and using them for the top layer of the boxes of prunes grown and packed in that state and selling them as prunes are all cleaned and evaporated in dryers, while there they are mostly dipped in lye, rinsed and thrown upon the sand to dry in the sun. Prunes are a very profitable crop to raise, an average yield from year to year for an acre of trees 10 years old, being 200 boxes, about five tons of green fruit, or over a ton and a half of dried fruit, worth from $120 to prune growers ard doing. G. H. Webster, of Clackamas, has dried 12 tons prunes this season; Albert and Rolla Holcomb have dried 14 tons; Marion Johnson, 14 tons; Jacob W. Roots, 10 tons; and Otto Genglebach, 4 tons, making a total of 54 tons or 108,000 pounds $5000 into that community.
