> The rapid development of the sheep industry now going on in the United States will tend to cut down the supply of cattle in the range states. Cattle and sheep do not thrive on the same range, and where the sheep come the cattle have to go. In this way the increase in the number of sheep will reduce the supply and increase the price of cattle. As the price of cattle goes up more cattle and less butter will be produced on on until an equilibrium is established between the prices of wool, cattle and dairy

There has been an almost phenomenal improvement in the quality of the mass of butter marketed in Portland during the past six years. This improvement has been due in large part to the establishment of a large number of creameries, but in no small degree to the introduction of separators and improved methods in the larger private dairies. There is, however, still room for much improvemet. There are but few of the creameries in the state whose product reaches a very high grade of excellence.
