

TOMORROW.

A fond, dotting mother, with eyes full of love, said, "Charley, oh, do pray tonight, and the angels will come on their shining wings

"To cause you sweet dreams of delight." "Oh, mother," he cried, "I am weary and sad, but tomorrow, dear mother, I will."

FOR HIS SAKE.

The twilight had deepened into darkness, and the fire was very low, but the red glow from the embers revealed the solitary inhabitant of the room sitting in an attitude of hopeless dejection.

"Oh, beauty!" said the colonel, with a long drawn sigh, and a softened expression of infinite pity came over his rugged features as he looked at the beautiful girlish face.

Just at this minute the heavy oak door was pushed noiselessly open and a small figure softly entered the room and crossed to the writing table.

"Es, Chappie's tum. What for oo kwy?" demanded the baby voice, and then, catching sight of the silver frame, he added, softly, "Chappie's movah—Chappie's booful movah!"

Then the little lad climbed on his father's knee and demanded a story. And hand in hand Dalmaine wandered with his little son through the delightful mazes of fairyland, forgetful of the overwhelming weight of trouble that had come upon him.

As they sat thus the library door opened and let in a flood of light from the hall. It fell on the curly golden head that nestled near the iron gray one, on the sweet baby features and on the man's rugged, sun tanned face.

"You must run away now, Chappie. I want mother. Good night, my son," and he stooped and kissed the sorrowful little face with all the tenderness of a woman.

"Fardle wants Chappie's movah," the child repeated to himself as he ran up the stairs, and then the library door closed, and the husband and wife were alone.

"You'll be brief, Travers, because I have an engagement," the cold, clear voice rang out.

"To-night your engagement must fall through. I have much to say, and I must say it now."

The colonel spoke with decision, and it was hard to believe that he was the same man who had just been telling Chappie such wonderful fairy tales.

"There are worse faults that can be laid at your door, my child," her husband replied gravely. "You owe some obedience to your husband, and tonight I wish that you remain at home. I will send an apology to Sir Arthur."

When the note had been duly dispatched, Colonel Dalmaine turned once more to his wife. She looked wonderfully beautiful, but it was the beauty of a statue.

and joy, is the cause of my most bitter misery! My child, I have excused you, even to myself, and have, moreover, blamed myself in a great measure that my love should not satisfy you.

"Beauty," he cried, "for my sake pause in your mad career, or if not for mine for Chappie's."

Surely that appeal would have touched any mother's heart, but Beauty Dalmaine heard it unmoved.

"I have listened to you patiently. Now I am going to the play with Sir Arthur Maynard." And then she vanished, and like one stunned her husband remained vacantly gazing at the door through which she had disappeared.

But Beauty Dalmaine did not go to the play that night. When she left the library, she slowly ascended the stairs with the intention of fetching a fan from her room.

Swiftly she flew down the passage and entered the nursery. The little lad's prayer had not been in vain. God had heard it and used it as an instrument to unlock the mother's heart.

An hour later, with weary footsteps and an aching heart, Travers Dalmaine climbed the nursery stairs, and on the threshold a beautiful picture gladdened his sorrow laden eyes.

"Travers, my husband, forgive me. I meant to go, but Chappie wanted me, and when I heard him say so there suddenly flashed on me the dark, loveless future I was making for my little son—our little son."

"For his sake we'll start again, my darling," he added.

"And for Chappie's father's sake," she whispered, as her white arms stole round his neck.

One evening I was walking with an English officer, when a dog came up and licked his hand.

A few nights afterward, returning alone to my hotel, I passed the same spot, when I suddenly felt a cold nose put into my hand and a tongue licking my palm.
