Some merriment was shown by the democrats for a time after the Dingley law went on the statute book. They time in ten years predicted that it would produce deficits constantly. The democrats were so accustomed, under the Wilson-Gorman law, to treasury shortages that they thought these things were the regular features of treasury statements. The possibility that the government would some time or other be paying its way again was something which they could not grasp. It soon became evident that the Dingley act, when it got fairly in operation under normal conditions, would more than meet the regular outlay of the government, but the Spanish war came on about that time, and new sources of taxation had to be devised. These met the expectations of their republican framers and, of course, falsified the prophesies of the democrats. Thus the treasury has a handsome surplus at this moment, although the army is up to the 100,000 line, and large expenditures are being made for the navy. A liberal but wise outlay is being made, yet the income is so high that the favorable balance keeps on growing. Secretary Gage is apparently in a jocand mood. He likes to be questioned regarding the condition of the treasury. The republican party, which has started up the idle mills and advanced the wages of the workers all over the country, has also filled the treasury of the government, and it will soon enable that government to resume the old republican practice of reducing its debt and diminishing the
