NIGHT TELEPHONE SERVICE.
It is Patronized by Physicians and Love Sick Fledglings.

Ever since 1834, Oregon City has been struggling along without a night telephone service. The lack of this modern convenience has been a disadvantage to the physicians, but the young couples who are carrying on a spirited courtship have missed the telephone the most. During the day time there was not much chance for lovers to get a word in edgewise. But all this is changed. Last Monday the night telephone service was introduced in Oregon City for the first time in 67 years. The night operator is Paul Gantenbein, and he will soon be in possession of the secrets confided to the wires by trusting lovers. Although the telephone company did not advertise the opening of the night office, it was known to at least four dozen young men and maidens before it had been open two hours. The night operator was doing in his chair, when there was a whirr on the switch board. A young lady's voice called for a certain number and the proper connection was made. Then the night telephone service began in earnest.

"Is that you George?"

"Yes; but who is this talking?"

"Oh you know well enough who it is."

"Upon my word I don't."

"Can't you tell my voice?"

"All voices sound alike to me."

"That's all right for you; but when are you coming up?"

"Can't come until I know who you are."

"Well, if you are so stupid, it is your tootay wootay that is talking."

"Too bad I am so far away."

"Indeed it is. Can't you send me a sweet?"

The night operator fell from his stool and relapsed into a swoon. When he regained consciousness a doctor was ringing violently and calling for a drug store.

Mayor Dimick is sick with the measles. He thought he could stand them off, but had to give up and go home last Monday.

The town ain't what it used to be,
Since the Mayor got the measles;
And everything is all at sea.
When the Mayor has the measles,
The council does not run just right.
The weather is a holy fright,
The whole town's in a sorry plight,
Since the Mayor took the measles.

A team belonging to G. W. Grace, the grocer, enjoyed a wild runaway last Saturday afternoon. They started at Fourth and Monroe streets on the hill and ran for several blocks. They were headed for the edge of the bluff and would no doubt have plunged over the declivity had not a freight train frightened them away. They were subsequently caught, the only damage being a broken spring on the wagon.
