FRED J. MEINDL, Chairman County Central Com.

La Fiesta de San Juan was at its height. Guanajuato was turning out from its serpentine streets, close built and ill smelling, its hordes of humanity, from the family of the Gobernador, handsome, well dressed and modern, down to the swarms of beggars, with sightless eyes and deformed limbs, bearing in their bodies the mark of Mexico, with her dark past.

The whole movement was toward the Plaza, the upper town, where the aristocratic element had by a natural law appropriated to itself the better air, prodigal in sunshine and flowers, clean water and fresh breezes, secure against the ever present dread of typhus.

Reservoirs supplying the city with water gave the location its name, and now, on the recurrence of his birthday, St. John, the apostle of healing waters, was to cleanse the city. The gates were to be opened and the plazas were to empty their flood into the now nearly dry river bed, carrying with it in a mad rush to the Lagos the year's accumulation of disease and debris.

The wealth and ultra fashion were out in carriages. Laughing faces of dark eyed señoritas dividing the attention with the picturesque vendors of holiday dulces or sweets, impossible gyrating monsters, ear spitting whistles and rattling devil's boxes, wildcap little urchins who played cart wheel and leapfrog or did tricks for centavos.

But the crowning event was to be the annual bullfight, in which, instead of professional matadores, young caballeros, men of high social rank, were to contend for the honors bestowed by the fair hand of the queen of beauty.

Great preparations had been made for this special function, and long before the appointed hour the rose garlanded old amphitheater, where since the days of Cortes man and beast had met in an uninterrupted series of unequal combats, was filled to overflowing.

On one side rose tier upon tier of dark eyed señoritas, closely guarded by ever watchful sentries; on the other side young bloods (hacendados), with the tightest of trousers and broadest of sombreros, heavily loaded with gold and silver trappings, here and there one in tailoring from the latest Parisian models, for everything French is undeniably dear and desirable to the Mexican heart.

While awaiting the arrival of the queen of the fiesta the audience centered its attention upon two men in their midst—Phillip Carter, the energetic, elegant American, whose homage to the royal Isabella during his few weeks' sojourn in Guanajuato had already given him notoriety, and Señor Enrique Costillo, a recognized suitor, even now "playing the bear" for her favor.

The presence of the latter, one of the best of their señores matadores, in the audience, signifying that he was to have no part in the fray, was causing evident comment among his friends. They could not know how the weary waiting for a signal from his love, the zealous devotion newly stimulated by a demon of jealousy born of Carter's evident favor with the girl, the very ardor of his passion had consumed his strength to such an extent that he knew better than to trust his future to a hand that trembled if but in the presence of her he loved.

When within two feet of his Sir Toro closed his eyes in a lunge, while the man from the ring dash for safety behind the gate. But there was hot blood in the veins of the south, too, and the jealousy had flung itself into the audience with such vim that him skip to one side safe, the ball could recover from the very embrace of death.

Two arms clasped the throats like hands of steel, the tanned beast lunged and vain endeavor to free his goads bent and snapped, dragged by one.

Then the dazed people with realization of this bit of drama groans and hurrahs rose again from 15,000 throats as struggled in an encounter before the history of bulls.

But never since the days has jealousy or desire for love even, matched human strength of a bull, and to grasp now surely weakened.

To drop now was certain, beneath the angry boofs which edged the ground so that man were of the earth's color.

Then the young señor with role of matador, was to have this bull, came to his senses, coolness hardly less notable, rigne's daring, and braving disgrace of attacking the bull, not charging approached the animal, watched his chance, and over he fell.

Don Enrique gave a bound neck and, alighting on his forehead to the queen to reward for his daring for her sake.

The crowd roared and he stamped in its excitement, girls snatched off their shawls, their flowers, cigars, hats, handkerchiefs by the thousand in a shower into the arena.

But Enrique was all unheeding was looking for something which she knew he had done for her sake. Did she think her mother would have done as much?

Two weeks later he received from Carter to forward his office of the Mexican Central.
