A Dog In a Glove. There is no question that the beagle is a very old breed. Early Roman accounts of England contain references to the beagle even by name. Books published from about 1580 to 1610 describe several varieties of hounds, including "the little beagle, which may be carried in a man's glove." That the miniature hound was extremely popular at that time was evident from Queen Elizabeth keeping a pack which were also said to be small enough to put in a glove. This statement is frequently ridiculed when it is not understood that gloves of that period were not the present day kind, but gauntlets reaching nearly to the elbow. What became of those glove beagles we may surmise from what we know of the results of later attempts to maintain packs of beagles of 8 to 10 inches high, the result after some years being weak puppies that fall short of the fine qualities of the little hunting dog when they are grown up.—Country Life in America.

Pious Soup. Some years ago a thrifty old cottager named Betha Rummy attended service every Sunday morning at the little church of St. Elizabeth, distant some two miles from her cottage on a hillside in Derbyshire. As regular in her provision for temporal wants as she was in attendance to spiritual necessities, her custom was to place a piece of bacon in a pot near the fire to be ready cooked against her return. Then, with her big prayer book wrapped in a snowy handkerchief, Betha trudged on to St. Elizabeth's. One Sunday, however, she came late and flustered to her usual place, just in front of the reading desk and to her vicar's astonishment remarked as she unfolded the snowy handkerchief: "Lawk a daisy me! if I haven't b'lied the prayer book and brought the bacon to church!"—London Chronicle.

At Burmeister & Andresen's. Mr. Ruffner, representing Eastman Kodak Company, will make a practical demonstration of the Eastman Developing Machine at Burmeister & Andresen's Jewelry store on Friday, September 26, from 2 to 6 p. m. ALICIA'S COWBOY By E. S. WINTHROP Copyright, 1902, by E. S. Winthrop

It needed no lurid posters spread with bucking bronchos and rough riders of the world to announce that Buffalo Bill was coming to town. The small boy betrayed an almost pathetic eagerness to reader small services to the heads of the households. The family clothesline disappeared under the burn to emerge later as a larlat and to violently choke the youngest hopeful wild horses in the family back yard.

The older folk were not above being interested in the matter. Paterfamilias told how in his younger days he had known a man who could shoot all around Colonel Cody. The mother recounted, with a faint blush on her faded cheek, how she had crossed the plains in 1873 and during a blizzard had been saved from an untimely death by the ministrations of a young lieutenant. In fact, the very blue blanket under which her husband now took his Sunday afternoon nap in the library was a souvenir of her narrow escape.

Between the two extremes the show was at once a bait and a reward. It was the peace offering when Strepson fought with Phyllis. It was a merit badge when Phyllis would not quarrel. Even Edward Thurston and Alicia Peyton were interested in the gaudy pictures as they strolled silently along in the mild spring air. Yet Thurston had just asked a certain fateful question, and Miss Peyton's "No" had been very decidedly.

"I like you better, perhaps, than any man I know," she had said. "Still, liking isn't love, and the man I love must be some one I can respect. You are a nice boy, a good talker and have all the advantages of birth and position. That is not enough. I want to marry a man—a real man, strong, reliant—like that man there." And she pointed to the lithographic reproduction of the Rosa Bonheur painting of Cody.

"But, Alicia," he urged, "this is so foolish, you know. A chap can't ride a broncho and wear chaps and spurs when a street car or a cab is the proper thing and patent leathers and black cloth are preferred. Let me show you." She raised her hand in protest. "Please," she said, "don't argue. It hurts me to say this. Don't make it worse by continuing a conversation that is painful."

So he held his peace, but as they walked slowly back to the house from the park each fresh "stand" of bills and Alicia's evident interest in them increased the twinkle which had come in Thurston's eye despite the blow to his hopes. When they reached her door, he would not enter, but as he took her hand he asked: "May I send you seats for the Wild West? I have friends with the organization, and while I shall not be able to be with you it would give me pleasure to know you were admiring the 'real man.'"

"Don't," she urged. "You are not kind. I didn't mean that I wanted to marry a cowboy, merely that I was tired of the effeminate men of the cities, men who never do things, who are content simply to exist. It is not your own fault that you are not other than you are. It is the fault of our modern training."

of the box. The nurse, fresh from Irish soil, was too much interested to watch her charge. The others trusted to the nurse.

At last came the cowboys, better mounted even than their associates. Six abreast they swept into the arena and came tearing down the stretch. Suddenly a groan went up, a great volume of tone like the voice of one mighty man. There, directly in the path of the riders, stood a fair haired child. The sun glauced from its dainty white dress and lit up the long flaxen curls till they seemed to form a halo about its head.

Alicia sprang up with a fearful scream. "Harry!" she cried. "Oh, my darling, come to sister!" Then she covered her eyes, not daring to face the awful horror she knew must come. The instant he did so some impulse compelled her to look again, and a ray of hope lit up her strained face. The riders on the inside had turned aside. The one nearest the child stooped and caught him up, and as a mighty shout went up from the crowd he swung the little fellow to the pommel of the saddle. The six moved on. They drew into their places, and the child shouted with delight at the novelty of his position, never giving thought to the danger he had faced.

As the horseman stood there waiting for the end of the entire Alicia sought his face, her eyes dimmed with grateful tears. Like his fellows, he wore the regulation blue shirt with its scarlet kerchief. The brown leather chaps were much like those worn by the others, and a huge sombrero threw the face in shadow. He was in no wise different from his fellows, yet it seemed to Alicia as if there was something familiar in the figure—something that suggested some one she had known.

It was absurd to imagine that she numbered a plainsman among her acquaintances, yet try as she would she could not take her eyes from him. Even when Colonel Cody passed on his splendid horse the graceful, well built figure and the tiny white form of her brother were all she saw. The colonel had made his little speech. He had introduced his congress of rough riders of the world with a sweep of his hat, all inclusive. The riders had advanced to the barrier, had retreated and were beginning the musical ride which finishes the entertainment.

At first the cowboys were within the circle. Gradually, however, the ranks thinned out, and on the last circuit they would have to pass the box. Harry's rescuer reined up as the box was reached and, drawing out of line, leaned forward to restore the boy. Alicia started forward to receive him, fully occupied with her little brother. Not until the rider was in motion again did she look into his face. Then she sank down, crying and laughing all at once. Mild hysterics, woman's universal panacea, had come to her relief.

After the siege of Peking had been raised and the emblem of Christianity had replaced the banners of paganism, according to the programme, the Peyton family were interviewing a young man who now wore the khaki uniform of a private soldier. His face was flushed with embarrassment. Peyton pere regarded him with benevolent good will and suggested that he had better come up to dinner. Peyton mere tried to say something suitable and wept quietly instead. The younger Peytons regarded him with awe, much as one looks upon a neighbor who suddenly achieves national greatness. All this was of interest, but there was a look in Alicia Peyton's eyes that made him wish the rest of the family would go away and leave him alone with her.

But when this wish was granted a few hours later Thurston was suddenly tonight tied and distressingly self-conscious. Alicia raised her eyes, brimming with tenderness, to his. "Since you won't take advantage of your bravery, sir," she said, "I suppose I will have to propose to you myself."

"It's not gratitude I want; it's love," he said gently. "You feel now that I must be repaid for picking up Harry."
