Sunday afternoon a company of young boys was sitting on the bank of the Willamette river in the residence part of this city. Unmindful that their remarks could be heard by persons seated on their porches in the vicinity, the little fellows were in turn relating what they would do if in possession of all of the money in the world. Various, indeed, were the uses to which the money would be placed but it remained for the last member of the group, a bright-eyed little fellow of about seven years, to suggest the truly boyish idea. "If I had all the money in the world," asserted the little fellow, "I would go to the Lewis & Clark Fair and take in every one of those darned shows on the Trail."

When descending the Fourth street steps last Sunday evening, two young ladies of this city were grossly insulted by a brace of drunken Indians. It is not an uncommon scene to witness these Indians in a drunken condition on the streets of the city, notwithstanding the fact that it is illegal for any drug store or saloon to dispose of intoxicants to these people. But they get it and get it whenever they desire it and can scrape up the necessary two-bits with which a cheap grade of alcohol is purchased and diluted sufficiently for drinking. The law in this regard, is violated frequently but the transgressing dealer in stimulents is apparently an unknown quantity, at any rate, one does not hear of his arrest and the imposing of a fine for the offense. On the other hand, the Indian population continues to make a spectacle of itself, at times even terrorizing the residents of the suburbs. They invariably wind up in the city jail and are jerked before some tribunal and sentenced to a term in jail. But the proceeding, which is as regularly repeated as the poor Indian becomes saturated, is the occasion for the running up of a bill of costs against the taxpayer. These Indians should be made to behave themselves or compelled to move on and, incidentally, the miscellaneous sale of liquor to these people should be prohibited and guilty persons punished. These intemperate Indians are an unnecessary expense to the community.
