FROM A LION'S JAWS.

Bridegroom's Narrow Escape on Honeymoon in Africa.

MAJOR POWELL-COTTON OWES HIS LIFE TO THE LONDON TIMES AND A WAGANDA HEADSMAN—HE RECOVERS FROM SEVENTEEN WOUNDS.

Major Powell-Cotton owes his life to the London Times and a Waganda headsmen—He recovers from seventeen wounds.

To have your newly wedded husband eaten by a lion is not the pleasantest experience for a young bride, and as that came very nearly happening as a honeymoon incident to Mrs. Powell-Cotton that young woman is of more or less interest just now in London.

The adventurous young couple who began married life by a year's excursion into the depths of the dark continent have done much more than initiate what is certainly an absolutely fresh line in honeymoons.

Major Powell-Cotton and his wife penetrated into the least known part of central Africa, and their expedition has been most fruitful in scientific results. Their contributions to natural history alone include six new animals—namely, the dusky African tiger cat, a new animal about the size of a leopard; the honey badger or black ituri ratel, the elephant shrew, an antelope armed with tusks which dives under the water, a new black and white monkey and a huge red buffalo.

Major Powell-Cotton traveled up the Nile to the Lado Enclave over two years ago with the intention of pushing his way southward to the Zambesi. South of Lado he secured a splendid specimen of the rare white rhinoceros, and he actually explored the whole country as far as Lake Albert Edward, but the fascinations of the Ituri forest proved too strong for him.

Of their experiences with the pygmies he says: "The excitement of these little people when they first saw my wife was extraordinary, for they had, of course, never previously beheld a white woman. Perhaps the chief source of wonder was her long hair, which, for the special benefit of the dwarfs, she would let down while they crowded around our tent in speechless wonder.

In their wanderings in the forest they came across curious little dwellings, which they were told were ghost houses, built for the shades of departed chiefs, who were apt to make themselves troublesome until provided with this accommodation. They learned, too, that in some spot in the innermost recesses of the forest an imposing religious rite takes place on certain occasions. In these an altar is erected, whereon offerings are laid while the pygmies arrange themselves in a semicircle and perform their devotions.

grass huts are built around a small platform about twenty-five feet by ten feet, which forms the playground of the children.

Major Powell-Cotton had many exciting adventures, but his narrowest escape was from a lion on the banks of the Sassa river, near Lake Albert Edward, in October. The country was infested by lions, which played around the camp every night and always disappeared before daybreak, but one morning the explorer saw a very large solitary male making his way back to the jungle and, cutting him off, fired, wounding the beast badly.

There was no time to reload, so Major Powell-Cotton hurled the gun into the lion's face and turned to run. As he did so the wounded animal sprang and, digging his claws into Major Powell-Cotton's back and legs, bore him to the ground. Then he tore his victim's coat to shreds, and after vainly endeavoring to raise his head and get at the eyes the infuriated beast attempted to tear open the abdomen; but, owing to a folded copy of the London Times which Major Powell-Cotton had in his pocket, the brute's claws were unable to penetrate to the flesh.

While the explorer lay almost crushed under the animal one of the porters rushed at the lion and hit him on the head with a stick, the Waganda headsmen slashing the animal across the eyes with a whip. This diverted the lion's attention, and at that moment an Askari shot him dead. It was then found that Major Powell-Cotton had received seventeen wounds. He, however, managed to ride to the nearest Belgian camp, where he was nursed back to health.

INDIAN STRENUOUSLY WOOS DUMMY IN DRESSMAKER'S WINDOW.

Strolling past the fashionable dressmaking parlors of Mme. Tillston in Council Bluffs, Ia., John Horse Bonaparte, a full blooded Omaha Indian, saw through the large glass window a charming female figure arrayed in a stunning gown.

Emboldened by the load of freewater which he carried, he first threw a kiss at the beautiful creature and then, to the consternation of the clerks, stalked into the parlor, held out his begrimed hands and in strains of broken but earnest eloquence implored the "beautiful paleface" to be his "squaw."

Unfortunately for his courtship, the object of his affection happened to be a dummy used to display the latest Paris creations.

His hand went clean through and came out just behind the flower he decked bonnet resting upon the dummy's golden locks. Startled at first, John Horse decided he had accomplished a deed of prowess and pulled out a knife to scarp his victim. He asked the proprietress for a whetstone where with to sharpen the weapon.

Before onlookers had rallied sufficiently to answer Officer Farnsworth had John Horse by the collar and led him from the room. He was booked at the station house as drunk and disorderly.

SHE BELIEVED WHAT THE PAPER SAID.

Thrown into a state of nervous prostration by reading an account published in a local newspaper of her supposed death, Mrs. Louisa Duley, aged forty-nine years, expired at Evansville, Ind. Through an error the death of a woman of the same name was reported as having occurred in Mrs. Duley's home, and Saturday evening as she read the story she fell from her chair to the floor. A physician was called, but was unable to learn the reason for Mrs. Duley's collapse. She became rational the next day and after talking a few minutes began to cry: "I am dead! I am dead! I saw it in the paper! And she died in hysterics."
