Origin of Rubber.
Long before Charles Macintosh began to make his waterproofs, in 1823, the natives of Quito were using the rubber for the same purpose, as well as for boots and bottles, and many other things. But the new and mysterious material had a hard struggle for popularity in England. Dr. Priestley probably did more than anybody else to make its novel qualities known, for in 1770 he popularized it forever by showing schoolchildren how it could be made to efface pencil-marks. Hence, of course, comes "india-rubber."
