THROUGH WITH RUM.

Time to Quit When Stuff Steals Away Man's Senses.

"I'm through with the drink thing forever," remarked the smooth faced man with the little nub of a cigar in that same tone that the hero uses down at the Cleveland theater when he says, "Yes, I'm gona' away from hyah foreverah!" The smooth faced man was just that positive about it.

"Nope," he said as he brushed the ashes off his coat lapel. "The rum proposition leads only to mortification and ruin. When a man gets so he pushes the button and doesn't know it, when it comes to a situation like that, it's time."

"Wait!" broke in the little chap with the fat top soft hat. "Just pause and slip back up the track about a car length! What you tell anything kindly begin at the table of contents, then go to chapter 1, and so on, will you? You talk like a busted down photographer."

"As I was about to say," went on the man with the nub of a cigar, just as if no one had stopped him, "when we got through settling the street railway question and a few other matters of moment that had to be disposed of before the bunch broke away last night it was lacking just a few minutes of being 2:30 o'clock. When I got home I says to myself, 'Why wake up little wifey when she needs the sleep?'"

"Acting on that suggestion, I took off my shoes just before I started to climb up the steps to our front porch, wondering to myself all the time how much of a discount I'd be able to deduct from the time I came home when I spoke of it at the breakfast table next morning."

"I walked up to the door just as quietly as a cat—and then rang the doorbell! Yep, I just pressed the dinky little electric button, and then I came in. I had my key in my pocket all the time! It wasn't more 'n a minute till my wife opened the door and saw me standing there, shoes in hand."

"Without going into any more details, is it any wonder I'm sore on the stuff that steals away men's senses?"—Cleveland "Plain Dealer."
