TILLMAN'S WEAK DEFENSE.

Seldom in the history of the Capitol has there been such occasion for equal excitement at the announcement of a speech as that shown early Monday morning when Mr. Tillman, the Senator from South Carolina, made his response to the charges did want the lands, and that he tried to secure them. "What man wouldn't TALKS TO FISHERMEN dent. Mr. Tillman was evidently in poor form. He showed the effect of his illness and the recent mental strain and justified to an extent the rumors that he had his physician's adtest against being convicted of stealing. He appeared to rely on the smallness of the offense to purge it of gravity. The principle of honesty was ignored by emphatic assertion that the small sum of forty-five hundred dollars made such a principle negligible and he referred several times as an unanswerable argument in his own favor to the fact that while he had attempted to secure only nine and one-quarter sections of government lands, Mr. Harriman had in his possession more than a million acres of it. The argument was not convincing and the galleries were not convinced.
