The Lincoln Farm.

The birthplace of Abraham Lincoln is rapidly being transformed into a national shrine. The plans for a memorial building enclosing the cabin have finally been adopted, and the program for its dedication which will take place on the centenary, February 12, has been tentatively made out. The final drawing by the architect has been made and accepted. Practically the sole exhibit in the memorial building is the birthplace cabin, which stands in the exact spot it occupied when Lincoln was born. For a little space about the cabin the memorial building is without a floor, leaving the ground as nearly as possible in its original state.

The edifice, with its classic columns, stands on a low hill, being approached by a broad sweep of steps at the bottom of which is an extensive plaza. From this plaza run down the old path to the famous rock spring. Two turnpikes and the spur of a railroad lead to the farm, but outside of these improvements, which are designedly plain and simple, in keeping with Lincoln's own life and character, everything is left as before. The farm will still be used as a farm, the trees will be undisturbed, even to one old, half dead apple tree, believed to be the last of the orchard of Thomas Lincoln, the father of the President. Despite its simplicity, however, the memorial building will be an imposing sight amid its humble surroundings.
