matter where you find it, the world over, and this applies equally well to the coffee bean. "But," said the Irishman, "it may be a black bean, which changes the color of your yarn." Which is also quite true. We might go down to the coffee wharves in New York City and buy a sack of raw Brazillan coffee beans, bring them right here and roast them-some just a little, and others from the same bag a dark brown or almost black color, you can readily understand that this would make two grades of coffee from exactly the same beans. One would be mild, while the dark roast would make a pretty heavy or strong cup of coffee. Then we could mix the two and make a med lum blend, so you see coffee is largely a matter of ROAST. We have a full assortment of roasts—light, medium and dark, of the very best known coffees of the world, which are Java, Brazilian and Puerto Rican grown. Tell us the cup you like and we can pretty near fill the bill or we have it put up in a "find out package" containing three distinct fla vors of coffee, all for 30 cents.

Try Baker's SIESTA, a mild, soft coffee, BARINGTON HALL, the modium strength, or the VIGERO, a strong black, invigorating coffee, the kind that wakes you up in the morning. Either kind, 40c the pound.
