Uncle Peter's Flag

A Fourth of July Story

By CLARISSA MACKIE

[Copyright, 1912, by American Press Asso

TLL be the first time in my life that a flag hasn't flown from the pole on a national beliday," murmured Uncle Peter Mason sorrowfully as he squinted up at the tallest flagstaff in Little River. It stood in the middle of his front yard, and it's gilded ball reflected the sunlight high above the highest tree.

His wife, Aunt Rebecca, held at arm's length a dingy object that once had been an American flag. Now the red and white stripes had been besten form gray color, and there was little enough of it, too, for the wind had whipped the emblem to a few tattered rage that might not have been recognizable had it not been for the stars carefully stitched by hand and the faded fragments of hand sewed stripes.

"It don't look like this had once been ten foot long," remarked Aunt Rebec ca. "After your father always flying the biggest flag in Little River and you carrying out the same idee I hate like poison to run up a small, cheap one, but I don't know what to do. That interest comes due the lat of July, and there sin't a cent to spare over, even for patriotism." "I know it, Rebecca. I haven't done more than price these big flags-$15 for this size unless I get a cambric one. You can always tell what a flag's made of by its hang and by its float. Job Little offered to let me have the flug and said I could pay him up by installments, but I says to him that was poor patriotism." "A cambrie flag is better than none," said Rebecca sensibly. "I was telling Etty about it the other day, and she says, says she, 'If I had time I'd make pa a flag, but I'm always so busy with and A. E. At supper Aunt Rebecca mentioned the coming anniversary for the first time in a week.

"What you going to do about a flag?" she asked. "Nothing, except run up the old one said Uncle Peter dispiritedly. "Seems too bad you couldn't have new one! How much was the big cambric ones, Peter?" "I've forgotten, Rebecca-more'n can afford anyway. I've been counting if I'd hadn't had any terbaccer for three years I might have had that new flag. Shows how a bad habit will trip you up sooner or later."

"Tain't a bad habit the way you smoke," defended Rebecca warmly, "My land, I guess you're entitled to that little comfort the way you've worked all your life!"

"Tain't no credit to me that I've worked. It's what I was put in the world for. Never mind about the flag. Becky. There'll be just as much patriotism in my soul when I run her up as if she was made of the finest silk. That's all that counts-what's inside your heart."

"I suppose you're right, father," said Rebecca, a little smile curling her lips as she arose to clear the table. After the dishes were washed and put away Rebecca tied on her white apron and went on to the porch, where the setting sun was gilding Uncle Peter's white bend into a reseate crown.

"What you doing?" inquired Rebecca "Going to run up the flag. No one in Little River ever got a flag up ahead of me yet," muttered Uncle Peter be tween his teeth clinched around hi pipestem.

He moved across the grass to the flag pole and fumbled with the halyards. Rebecca bustled into the bouse ar came out with a mass of red, white and blue folds in her arms. She stood close to Peter's elbow before she spoke and when she opened her lips her voice trembled.

"Peter, look here," she quavered. Uncle Peter Mason looked and gasped: "What in land, Becky Mason!

Where did you get it? It sin't-it sin't the one that was down to Little's, but it looks like it! Where did you get it?" He was excitedly shaking out the folds of the big flag, and his feeble old flugers trembled as he saw that it was quite as large as the one his mother and made so many years ago.

Aunt Rebecca was crying with de-light. She belped him spread the stars and stripes on the grass. "This blue," she said, touching the star sprinkled field, "is made from my

reverently. "And the stripes was made from all the white poptin dresses I've had, and there was a sight of the stuff-some of it I dyed red-and"-

Uncle Peter had ber in his arms, and they were kissing each other, and Uncle Peter was trying to tell his wife that he would rather have hung up his best Sunday shirt than have her cut up her wedding gown. "I know how wimmen feel about such things," he apologized, trying to keep his delight out of his faded eyes,

"Don't say a word, Peter. It's the happiest day of my life!" cried Aunt Becky warmly. "Let's h'ist her up now, Peter, and show Little River we're still on deck!"

Just then there was a light step on the graveled path, and Etta came around the corner of the house with a huge bundle under her arm. When she saw the flag she stopped and stared. "Why, where did that come from?"

she gasped. Aunt Rebecca proudly explained. "Would you believe it?" exclaimed poor Etta. "Look here, ma and pa?" She unrolled the bundle under ber arm and spread it on the grass.

It was another flag, just as large as Rebecca's, but made of new material-some sort of cheap bunting neatly sewed into a flag. Uncle Peter was openly crying.

HE GOT STILL ANOTHER PLAG.

"Every stitch?" she said proudly. "If I'd only known ma was going to make one-but there, ma, if I'd only told you you might have saved your wedding dress, but ain't you smart to make it?" "I've got two flags," sobbed Uncle

Peter, "made by the two best women in the world." "Look at what's coming;" cried Etta. alert with new interest. "It's Job Little and three men from the lodge." When Job Little's speech was con cluded Uncle Peter found himself the essor of another immense flag, a gift from a few of his closest friends who wanted it to fly from the tallest staff in Little River

And that was not all Later the ex press wagon drove up and left Peter a box which turned out to contain anoth er flag-this one made of slik that rus tled richly as it fell from the box. "Who the land?" gasped Aunt Rebeccu.

"Compliments and best wishes of John Hamilton and family-for Uncle Peter Mason Long may she wave!" rend Uncle Peter brokenly from the card in his hand

"Who would have believed them summer boarders would have remembered our old flag was wore out," comment ed Etta practically. "Now, pa. what you going to do? Here you've got four flags. You can't hang 'em on the pole all to once without some being half

Uncle Peter's but had been removed long ago, when he had brought out the tattered remmint of his mother's flag and the setting sun gilded his white bend and glorified the faces of the men and women who stood about him. "I shall use 'em alternate." announc ed Uncle Peter at last; "first one and then another. Tomorrow, being the Fourth of July, I shall divide the day into four watches of three hours each and give every flag its turn. I can't thank anybody yet. I'm too happy. I hope nobody will be offended, but I feel like I'll run up my mother's flag first with Rebecca's. She made it from her wedding dress. Nobody object?"

"Of course not!" they cried heartily, and in a trice the faded bit of bunting that had been flung to the breeze so many years once more floated over Little River, and beneath it rippled out the splendid folds of Rebecca's flag.

"I think them two flags better float all day tomorrow," said Job Little decidedly, "and these three others-Etty's and Hamilton's and ours-we'll jest drape on the plazzs. What say?"
