

A Mutiny

By DONALD CHAMBERLIN

On my last voyage with Captain Waterman we had bad luck with the crew. Two men were lost overboard in a storm, three died of sickness, and five deserted at Madeira. We went through the strait of Gibraltar with eight men and when we reached Naples were reduced to six, for we had scarcely cast anchor when two more men left us for parts unknown.

We lay in Naples a week, taking on a cargo of olive oil, figs and Italian fruits. Several days before sailing on the return voyage the captain was requested to take some money to New York. It wasn't much, but quite enough to excite the cupidity of a common sailor. Waterman was so proud of being entrusted with the amount—about $12,000—that he had to tell one of the men about it. The worst of it was that we were obliged to make up the crew at Naples in order to take the ship back to New York, and any one who has ever been in Naples will understand what kind of men we were obliged to accept. Some of them were a weak, aged, degraded lot, while the rest looked as if they had seen service as brigands. The fact is that before we got through with them I made up my mind that they had spent the greater part of their lives behind bars.

When we sailed away from Naples I confess I had misgivings about ever getting across the Atlantic with such a crew. The second mate, Hanford, felt a good deal as I did about it, but the captain didn't seem to feel the least uneasy. Before making due westward we went down to Messina to take on oranges. The evening of our arrival I noticed by the looks of the men and certain hurried consultations that something was brewing. Instead of going to my berth when I came off watch and feeling uneasy, when no one saw me I slipped into one of the ship's boats. I hadn't been there very long before there was a commotion beneath me. I heard shots down below decks, and several of the crew poured up the companion-way and the whole lot of them talked hurriedly directly beneath the boat I was in. I knew by what was said that they had killed the captain and the second mate and had been disappointed in not finding me in my berth. What had become of me was their chief topic of conversation, and it seemed to trouble them very much. Some one said that he had seen a man leap overboard, and this seemed to satisfy them that I had thus escaped, but they didn't propose to take any chances, and their leader, dividing the ship into sections, detailed two men to search each section. Certain of us were captured if I remained where I was, when no one was near me I let myself down into the water and, swimming to the rudder, climbed up on it. Not being a first class swimmer, I didn't dare to try to get to the shore, which was fully a mile distant.

It wasn't long before I heard the anchor being drawn up, and I felt sure that the men were going to put out somewhere and I would stand a good chance of being drowned perched where I was. However, I couldn't help myself and must take my chances of meeting death that way rather than giving myself up to be murdered. They sailed northeastward and in a few hours came near land, which was a part of the toe of the boot of Italy, as it appears on the map. They coasted along till they came to a very thinly settled region from which mountains rose from a beach. There they ran the ship ashore. Taking two of the boats they landed, and, turning the boats adrift, they began to walk northward on the beach.

I was now relieved of my fear and turned my whole energies toward following them up and turning them over to the authorities for punishment. Swimming forward to the bowsprit chains, I climbed up on deck, lowered a boat and when the men were passing around a spur in the mountain pulled away from the ship. When I came in sight of them again I was in their rear, and they were too far away to see who I was, and, in order to null any suspicions they might have, I pretended to be fishing.

After proceeding northward for a couple of hours, coming to a gap, they turned eastward. I pulled ashore and, leaving my boat, took the only road they could have followed. They stopped at a small town, and I halted outside. When they left the place I entered it, and, finding telegraph facilities, I sent a message to the nearest point where I would be likely to find a police force sufficient to handle them and sent an account of the situation, with the description of the men were moving. I was supposed to keep track of them if possible and post the police from time to time of any change in their route.

About 5 o'clock in the afternoon I met the police detachment and guided them to a point where I knew the men were journeying. We let them proceed in a sort of pocket, where we waited on them to surrender. They were only partly armed, and the police, besides outnumbering them, all had rifles. This brought them to terms, and we captured them, including the $12,000 they had with them.

They were taken to Naples, where they were tried. Some of them had been compelled to join the mutiny, and they were let off. The ringleaders were given solitary confinement for life, while the rest got light sentences.

THE WAY OF THE CROSS

A dear old lady wants me to write something on the ministry of pain.

She asks why there should be pain in the world, and, being here, how it can minister to good.

Of course I do not know why pain should be in the world except as I can see its uses.

The poet says, "No pain the body suffers that the soul may not grow by," which is to say the spirit may be benefited by the travail of the body its overcoming, the spirit may strengthen itself.

A brutal view? Not necessarily. But if so it is to be avoided. None of us can escape pain of the body or suffering of the mind in every life there must be sorrow and change and loss and decay.

How shall one grow strong except one shoulders his cross? How find the virtue of endurance save by deprivation and agony of mind?

Being human, there is no other way. You may or may not accept the religious view. You may or may not take up the challenge of the Nazarene—"He that would be my disciple let him deny himself and follow me."

But—You cannot escape the vicissitudes of mortal life. If pain and struggle do not come to you today they will come nevertheless. The blight of loss no less than the joy of increase is part of your mortal heritage.

How will you meet the crisis? Stoically? That may be for some rare souls. Certain it is that, no matter how you may strive and cry out, you cannot change the decrees of destiny.

Why not try patience and submission and courage and faith? If so doing you transform the struggle from despair to hopefulness. You give your brave spirit a chance to fight its battles.

And that chance for high courage is one of the ministries of pain.

Why not accept that view? You need not disdain your trouble. But you need not shrink and cower under its load.

Pain is a barrier against which fortitude and patience and faith may cast themselves and in the spirit of the overcoming life become valiant, though chastened.

"Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

That is one way.

It is the way of the cross.
