Plaintiff Alleges C. H. Kenny, Engl neer in Charge of Train, Was Reckless, Careless and Incompetent

C. P. Hagen, father of Melvin Hagen

who lost his life in an effort to save Alma Summerfield January 7 crossing the Molalla river trestle, filed a suit against the Southern Pacific Monday in the circuit court for $7,500 for damages he alleges are due to the death of his son. Hagen charges in his complaint that

C. H. Kenny, the engineer in charge of the train, was "reckless, careless and incompetent," and that his eyesight was so weakened that he was con pelled to wear spectacles. The father further alleges that Kenny, "prior to January 7, 1914, had killed 21 persons all known to the plaintiff.

The train was an hour late and was running at a speed of 40 miles an hour at the time the tragedy happened, says Hagen. The plaintiff states that the track north of the trestle is straight and that a capable and competent engineer could have stopped the train before it reached the spot where Miss Summerfield and Hagen were.

The accident happened on the even ing of January seventh, at about 7:30 o'clock when Melvin Hagen, Alma Summerfield and Rosa Summerfield were on their way from their home at Canby to Barlow where they were to a mile south of Canby they heard the approaching train and all three started to run. Miss Alma Summerfield, the older of the two sisters, either fainted or caught her foot when Hagen turned around and grabbed the sinking girl. Before the young man could escape with Miss Summerfield they were hit by the train and thrown to the ground 80 feet below. Miss Summerfield was found dead by the first to reach her body, but Hagen lived about 30 mintides. Each of the victims of the accident was 18 years old, the day of young Hagen's death being two days after his birthday.
