In an invalid chair sits an old man. He was stricken by paralysis some months ago, and he is helpless and must be cared for constantly. Con stant pains torture him. He is not an American by birth. In his youth he fought in the Franco-Prussian war on the side of the victor. He was a brave soldler and saw much active service. When the great war broke out in Europe this old man, whose mind is strong, although his body is feeble, was asked to explain the former war and its bearing on this year's strife. It was pleasant to see him straighten up, in spite of his, infirmity, and try to make everything clear to his questioner. With patient finger he traced on the map the movements of the German and French armies. Forgotten were his new nullictions and his pains in his desire to be helpful to the younger generation to make them understand the cause for which he had fought He was doing something for others -a thing that would have seemed im possible to him before.
