According to the statements of the two women, Blazier and Stone arranged the party and told them that they would take them up the Clackamas river for dinner. They also told them that they would bring along some liquor, but both women deny that they drank any of it.

Shortly after crossing into Clackamas county on the 82d street road, County Motorcycle Officer Meads saw the machine, driven by Blazier, and borrowed from his brother, Eugene Blazier, also of Portland, exceeding the speed limit by about 10 miles an hour. Both men admitted having been drinking in the machine but Blazier claimed all ownership of the liquor and volunteered the information that he had more of it where this came from. He pleaded guilty to the charge of transporting liquor, but claimed that he thought the law only referred to the importation of liquor.
