RIVALS ROOSEVELT; FINDS STRANGE GAME; EXPERIENCES THRILLS

H. L. Martin, William Weismandel, of this city, and Al Johnson, of Canby, who have been on a hunting trip in Southern Oregon, returned to Oregon City Friday. Dr. L. G. Ice accompanied the men on the hunting trip, but returned several days previous to the other hunters. The party in all shot three deer. They went to West Fork, beyond Roseburg, and during their stay in the wilds a forest fire was raging, driving many of the deer to the highlands.

The men have a great joke on Weismandel, which they are now telling. It was while Weismandel and Johnson were on a hunting jaunt for big game. Weismandel spied an animal, which he had taken for a coyote, and still claims it was one, but Johnson says that it is a cougar, as it looked like a big cat in the eye. Weismandel states it looked more like a dog. Anyway Weismandel took a shot at it when it was but 20 feet away, but the shot went short, and the animal leaped into the forest and out of sight. Johnson states the head was large, and Weismandel says it was small, but now insists that before leaving for another hunting trip he is going to consult an optician and find out if his eyesight is deceiving him for hunting, and if it is will invest in a pair of glasses so he can tell the difference between a cougar and a coyote.

The party brought back supply of jerked meat, which is well flavored. The hunters took with them a supply of salt to prepare the meat. The forest fires in that section were under control at the time of their departure. Owing to the long continued dry weather, as it has not rained in that section for about 120 days, the underbrush is dry and brittle, and easily catches fire from the flying embers.

BOOZE IMPORTERS HAVE HARD WORK TO RUN BLOCKADE

A wild midnight ride was enjoyed by Sheriff Wilson and Deputy Frost Thursday night, when the officials chased a suspected booze car from the south end hill to the Clackamas bridge at Gladstone. The auto, with about 80 quarts of California whisky aboard, was finally captured on the East 52d street road by Portland police officers, acting on telephone advice from Sheriff Wilson.

It is understood that the booze came into Canby in two large steamer trunks Thursday evening, and was called for at the depot some time later by two men with a large high-power auto. The local officers met the car out on the south end road, but on account of the number of machines traveling and the meager description of the car given, were unable to identify the car until it had whirled by. The officers were soon under way in pursuit but decided to head the booze machine from Portland and immediately got in touch with Portland officials, who nabbed the machine as it came into Portland. Sheriff Wilson states that had they been sure of the identity of the car they would have fired at the tires, and brought the party to an abrupt stop. The cargo of liquor was in a big seven-passenger car. The Portland police responded immediately and sent officers out on several roads leading into the city.

The Dosers were married in 1914 in Portland, and the complaint sets forth that the defendant, Adah Doser preferred theatre parties and dances to the company of the plaintiff. Among the other allegations of cruel and inhuman treatment are that plaintiff was compelled to cook his own meals, that his spouse would often speak of him as a "darn fool," and that on numerous occasions she stated she wished he would join the army. Frequent visits with a soldier stationed at Vancouver are also alleged in the husband's complaint.
