

Newsy Briefs From All Over the County

Macksburg

MACKSBURG, Ore., Nov. 21.—The traditional dreariness of November seems to have expended itself in 1917, upon a heavy mist with which the earth is covered—as with a blanket—through all the morning hours and from which it emerges at about noon, radiant in as bright a sunshine as ever beamed upon us in May. This effluence lasts till the sun takes his departure at 4:30, thus lengthening our little ten-hour-day to its utmost extent, beneficently, too, for never were days fuller of work for the ranchers and their families than are these. What with the land clearing, potato-sorting, and fuel-providing, out-of-doors and the multitudinous home duties within, the time is all too short for Thanksgiving preparation, for the creation of Christmas gifts and work for the Red Cross.

Some writer has said that "Only those people are happy who rise in the morning not knowing how they shall get through the work before them for the day." On a Western Oregon ranch this alleged requisite for felicity, surely is not wanting.

The Red Cross work that many thought impossible to take time for, is making way for itself in many a busy home. The almost obsolete art of knitting has revived to an extent we could not have dreamed of two years ago. Even the children are learning to convert balls of yarn into useful things for the soldiers at the battle front, and with the revival of knitting comes back the ancient habit of putting all the spare moments to use. With practice, knitting grows to be so nearly mechanical. So little effort of brain and of muscle are necessary to the work that it is as restful and far more pleasing than is inaction. Moreover it offers not the slightest hindrance to sociability and for this reason is well adapted for the quiet gatherings with which the daily toil is varied. Many a soldier coming from the watery trench into a warm Y. M. C. A. tent will be provided with dry garments that he could not have but for these busy circles at home. Here, too, loyalty is fostered and unanimity in the great cause is promoted by united work for the Red Cross.
