J. M. Hamilton, one of the most competent horsemen of this city, had a miraculous escape from being trampled to death Saturday afternoon on Main street between Sixth and Seventh, when a horse he was leading became frightened at the sound of a whistle on an automobile. Mr. Hamilton, in company with Mr. King, of Logan, were taking two horses to the steamboat landing at Eighth and Water streets to be shipped up the river. The horse nearest to the buggy became frightened and jumped, his two front feet landing in the rear of the buggy. This caused the frightened animal to almost capsize the buggy, and Hamilton jumped to endeavor to free the animal from its perilous position. By the time Hamilton alighted from the buggy, the horse had become free and started to run. Hamilton was thrown heavily to the pavement, the maddened horse trampling him terribly. People rushed to his assistance, but before reaching the spot the man had been able to get his own footing, and was again thrown to the ground, but he held tightly to the horse fearing its breaking away into the crowd, and surprised the terror-stricken people who had witnessed the accident, by raising his feet. His face was bleeding in several places. His nose was badly lacerated. The horse started to dash into the crowd of people, which had gathered, but was caught by the nose by C. I. Stafford, who held him tightly until taken in hand by Mr. King.
