Luncheon was served at twelve, of which all partook heartily, and no one even missed the rabbit. While Mrs. Tidd went to the saw mill five miles away to make the final preparations for the party, she left Charles with proper instructions as how to roast the rabbit while he finished the building. Becoming enthusiastic over his carpenter work, he forgot to play the part of chef and it was then that it happened! None would have been wiser if he had not been discovered in his dilemma.
