ANNUAL COST FOR RATS IS $200,000,000

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 10.—Two hundred thousand men are working full time to support the nation's rat population.

Mr. Nussbaum and family attended a surprise party Saturday evening given to Mr. and Mrs. Pollard, of the Hazelia neighborhood to celebrate their 10th anniversary. All met at a neighboring house and collected in a body under a window, when at a given signal cow-bells began to ring and all exerted their voices to the utmost of about 35 pairs of lungs, startling the inmates, fearing the "Shadow" of Portland had journeyed out of town and got lost.

They came loaded with baskets of good things, and spent a very happy evening, and left a table full of Aluminum dishes, instead of tin, to remind them for years to come of their happy 10th anniversary.

We hope no one will forget the date of the Farm Bureau meeting at Stafford. Lets all go. If there is anything of interest coming to us farmers, lets investigate and stay at home thinking we will its just some scheme of those city fellows to fleece the farmer. This sort of penny wise, and pound foolish ideas is past. Farmers are willing to investigate these days.

Pioneers Honored at Party at Logan

FEBRUARY FARM NOTES.

One is tempted to keep his brood sows too fat for best results. It is a strange fact that a sow too fat will produce pigs that are underweight and few in number. So the sow's feed should be chosen wisely, limiting the fat-making element. She should have food that is rough and high in protein. Alfalfa hay is exceptionally good. Above all else, see that she is not closely confined, but has room to exercise.

How would you like to carry a load for several miles, these cold days, and then be forced to stand still out in the cold for an hour or so, without any extra wraps? Not many would survive. It's just as cruel to treat a team of horses so. But in these days of near zero weather one can see many horses hitched along Main street, with no sign of blankets. For the lessening of this evil, the United Horses' Union doubtless would, if they could, give unanimous vote of thanks to Henry Ford.

Sheep are now down to the ridiculously low price of $3.00 a hundred pounds, which means that full grown ewes will bring from about $2.00 to $3.50 a head—about one-tenth their price two years ago this winter. They were every one buying. Now no one wants them. But right now the rule of the old Montana horseman is worth remembering. He made his fortune, he says, by selling when the majority wanted to buy, and buying when every one else wanted to sell—a mighty sensible plan to follow. Sheep will not stay at such an absurd price—the cost of two good hens. If one got them only to clean up his place, to mow down his weeds and destroy his brush, they would be worth more than their present price.

The best time to sell a milk cow is when she is just fresh. And following the logic of this truth, that is theoretically the poorest time to buy. It is in fact. It is a mistake made by many dairymen—and old ones, too, for that matter—as is evidenced by the big prices these cows bring at every public sale. The newly fresh cow displays all her virtues and none of her defects. All that can be told about her is that she gives a big volume of milk, but one knows not how long it will continue, nor even its degree of richness. A far better rule is to buy cows whose calves are at least two months old.

Planning the next year's work with pencil and paper is not practised enough. The great good that comes from the outlining of a definite program is the setting of standards towards which to work. The program should include every phase of the farm work, and it is worth while to talk it over with the boys and the female side of the family. Certain fields should be allotted to corn, others to oats, etc., the yields estimated, and plans made for handling the grain. Such advance planning stimulates the interest of the young folks, for it cements the efforts and directs them toward a common object. A proposal of a bonus for high yields or exceptional success with poultry, dairy, etc., above a previously determined quota, helps solve the problem of how to keep the young folks on the farm.—Farm Life.
