The Return of Prosperity

The business men and workers of Oregon City may well be encouraged by the results of the careful investigation of business conditions reported in the Literary Digest of the past week. This publication sent out a questionnaire to financial editors of 440 daily newspapers, besides to a long list of heads of big business, and professors of economics in colleges.

A business depression is largely psychological, that is, it results from the existence of certain ideas in the minds of the people. If everyone is looking for depression, there will probably be one. If people generally expect prosperity, it is likely to come.

This investigation therefore gives great promise of prosperity, in the fact that four fifths of the financial editors expressed confidence that actual business recovery is already on the way, or will be evident as early as March or April. The big business men answered in the same proportion, expressing substantially the same idea. The college professors alone were pessimistic. more than half of them holding that conditions would be worse before they are better.

The ordinary man will feel that men actually engaged in business or who as financial experts are reporting conditions for newspapers, are closer in touch with actual conditions than the college authorities, who get their opinions second hand.

One thing was emphatically brought out by this investigation, that in a great many localities there has been no depression at all. Retail trade has been splendid all through the winter in many sections and there is little unemployment in those localities. Great numbers of people have earned high pay and have had full time, and they will buy a lot of spring goods.
