Learning Co-Operation

School children need object lessons and experiences in the idea of community co-operation, so that they shall form the habit of taking hold and helping in public

It is for instance a very useful thing when children give an entertainment or raise money otherwise, to buy pictures and statuary to beautify their school rooms, far better than if the same were given to them. Thus they see that great improvements can be effected if people take hold and work together. When they undertake such enterprises, every child should be taught that he or she must co-operate in some way, or else one will be a kind of slacker.

School children ought always to have certain community enterprises that they are carrying on for the good of their home city. Making some contribution to home town progress should become one of the habits of their life. During the war, they got this idea by selling war saving stamps, canvassing for liberty bonds, etc. In many towns they get it now by helping pick up street litter. by setting out trees on the streets and public parks. and by assisting to remove rubbish, etc.

They should be made to feel that they must do something to further all the community efforts that the older folks are promoting. If a Clean Up Day is being held, every child should be coached to do something himself to remove ugly objects and make a report to the school of what he did.

Children should be encouraged to study for themselves into the conditions of the city, and to report the things that they think their home town needs. Some of their suggestions will be practical and things that the children can take hold and do themselves. If they are encouraged thus to formulate and carry out plans for public improvement as a regular part of their duties as growing citizens, the habit of co-operation ought to become a permanent tendency that will make them good civic workers when they grow up.
