

It Wouldn't Pay to Advertise
A Poor Article

Nor a proposition of doubtful merit or honesty—for ad-readers, nowadays, are DISCRIMINATING. They know values—they know GENUINE things, genuine opportunities.

Any article which can be sold by advertising is, by that test, a GOOD article. YOU are safe in buying a thing which has "stood the fire of publicity."

The maker of a widely advertised article, or commodity, is always on trial for his business life. He cannot shirk, nor cheapen his product—and this is the best possible protection for the consumer.

You are SAFE in buying advertised things—it's the logic of nowadays business conditions.

Training Camp Echoes Tell of Great Work by Youngsters.

Manager of New York Nationals Says Five of His Recruits Look Like Comers—Brooklyn Has Two Corkers. Chance Sweet on Vic Saler.

The annual season for talk of wonderful baseball "finds" is on, and on strong reports emanating from the training camps tell of the number of pocket editions of Wagner, Cobb, Lajoie and Mathewson that have been found—wonderful batters, fielders and base runners.

Manager McGraw of the Giants has become very "sweet" on outfielder Jack Johnston, pitcher Harry Rusten and infielder Fullerton and St. Forsythe. It is believed that the "Little Napoleon" will hang on to this entire quintet.

Their work at Marlin Springs, Tex., has been exceedingly good, far above the average recruit's brand, and McGraw is confident that with a year's experience every one of them will be ripe for a regular berth.

Bill Dahlen of Brooklyn says he has two wonders in Mack Owen, a pitcher, and Lejeune, an outfielder. Dahlen thinks the latter is a future star par excellence. Bill also says his young pitcher has everything a twirler should possess, including that great essential, control.

Manager Chance says he has a great bunch of youngsters to help out his veterans this season. The peerless leader seems to have gone daft over Vic Saler, his young first baseman. Correspondents say Chance thinks so well of the youngster that he may become a bench warmer this season and let the youngsters hold down the initial sack.

Geese With Melodious Honks Share Honors With Prima Donna

HUMPERDING'S poetic opera "Koenigslander," which had its first production on any stage at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, introduces an entirely novel feature in opera. The public is not unfamiliar with seeing horses, donkeys and dogs among the dramatic personas of a stage production, but it remained for Mr. Humperding to present a sample of the poultry yard in his lyric drama. The heroine, who is beautifully personated by the well known American prima donna Miss Geraldine Farrar, is simply a "goose girl." When she makes her appearance on the stage she comes on followed by her flock of geese—not imitation geese, no mechanical devices wound up with a key and run by clockwork, but real everyday geese, raised on a Long Island farm. At first their appearance on the stage created a little titter among the audience, but it was not before the public took the birds as seriously as they did the other members of the cast, for they conducted themselves with an extraordinary consciousness of the importance of their services to the drama. They had been carefully trained by the technical director of the opera house, Edward Sledge, and man who has extraordinary tact in handling birds—wild birds, domestic birds and operatic song birds. Before each performance these geese have to undergo a limited fast. A judicious use of corn, both behind the scenes and on the stage, enables the prima donna and stage attendants to guide the action of the flock. Just how much the geese appreciate Mr. Humperding's music is something no one can find out, but had the composer written separate parts for the birds he could not have wished them to vocalize at more appropriate moments or more rhythmically than they have done at each performance. It is curious also to note that the voices of the geese at no time sound discordant with the human voice or the instruments no matter what the orchestra is playing or Miss Farrar is singing.
