Sometimes the contestants in a cariers' contest feel that they have not had a square deal. They feel that they have put a lot of energy into their forts that is unappreciated. This is because the awards are made for the largest number of subscriptions turned in and the city carrier has a decided advantage over the carrier in the smaller communities where there is less chance to get large numbers of subscribers.

Should the awards be offered for the largest percentage of possible subscribers turned in, the cartier in territory where homes are scattered would have as good a chance as the carrier in the more congested districts.
