Duties of a Parlor Maid.

A parior maid is expected to take charge of the parlors and dining room and lower halls of a house only. There is apt to be a butler or a waitress in the establishments where a parlor maid is kept, so the duties of waiting on the table do not come within her province.

morning in a plain light gingham dress, with an apron with shoulder straps, and bib and wears a cap. in the afternoon she wears a black dress with apron, collar, cuffs and cap. After she rises in the morning she dusts the pariors, halls and all the rooms on the lower floor. When she has eaten breakfast she begins the regular work, which is planned a little differently for each household.

On one morning she sweeps the parlor, on another the library, and so on during the week. In the afternoon the maid must be ready to open the front door if the butler is dressing or occupied with some afternoon work. She may bring in afternoon tea, and in a family where there are children she very often gets their supper and waits on them in their own dining room or at their especial table.

If there is a governess in the famfly it is the duty of the parior maid to see that her meals are properly servis expected to be always neatly dress ed and immaculate, so she has her laundry work done for her and has no heavy, rough work to do. She is not expected to wash windows or clean the sidewalks and front steps.

Dressing by System.

One of the best dressed women in Paris has a rule that she follows in choosing her clothes which has made her wardrobe the success that it is. Perhaps some girl who is planning her spring outfit may profit by her sug-Says the clever Frenchwoman: "1 buy only four new gowns a year. 1 get one in the spring, one in the summer, another in the autumn and the last in the winter. In these gowns, too, I specialize. I let each represent a class. One year I will get a good tailored suit, an evening dress, a fine negligee, perhaps, and so on. Another year I will choose a morning gown, an afternoon frock, a dance dress, and, of course, if necessary, have some remodeling done to last year's wardrobes. In this way I have a good toilet for every occasion. "Then I spend the rest of my allowance on the smartest and best neckwear, vells, gloves, stockings and other little things that I can afford. These dress et ceteras, if they are dainty and smart, count more for effect in the long run than fine dresses without them. If you can't have both get plain or conservative suits and dresses and add chic and vary their monotony with little things. Hats, veils, neck fixings and gloves have a lot to do with the smartness of one's appearance. An expensive suit with the wrong hat doesn't look half so well as a less costly suit with the right hat."

Captain Jack and Captain Ben

By MARGARET FOSTER

Margaret Swift was born and trought up on the New Hampshire loast among seafaring people.

Copyright by American Press Asso-clation, 1911.

When Maggie grew of enough to have a lover there were two candidates for her favor. Both were assistants on fishing smacks. Jack Cady was a wild youngster who promised ho good, and no good ever came out of him. Ben Wharton was a stendy young fellow, whose parents never had any occasion to worry about him. Maggie at first preferred Jack, but as soon as she came to an age to see the difference between the two young men she found Ben the more acceptable of the two.

Both Jack and Ben went to sea, and both became masters of vessels when they were still very young. Both were much in love with Maggie, and each strove to accumulate the means whereby he might be enabled to claim her. Shough this is rather true of Ben than Jack, for while the former progressed steadily the latter did so by fits and starts, now and again getting into positions where any money he had saved was needed to help him out.

Maggie's father was interested in her marrying a man who could give her a home and comforts. He believed she would wed with one or the other of these two young captains and used to say to them:

"The man that gets my daughter with my consent must be able to take care of her."

This at once caused a rivalry tween the two men for something more mercenary than love. Ben in a few years owned a part of the vessel be commanded, but Jack, owing to his unsteadiness, was in about the same condition as at his starting. Maggie really began to love Ben, and Jack, thinking that his rival was favored because he had more means than he, became very much disgruntled.

Toward the end of one of Ben's voyages he was approaching the coast of New England when what seemed to be a derelict appeared ahead. Nearing ber, she was found to be a vessel lumbering in the waves half full of water, part of her cargo soaked and ruined. but the rest in good condition. The name on the stern was so blurred that it could not be made out, and it was supposed that it had needed freshening when the vessel had been abandoned, and since, the waves beating upon it, had rendered it still more faint. One man who examined it closely said that it had been scraped.

The ship not being greatly damaged and half the cargo in good condition, Captain Ben saw a chance for prize money for himself and his crew. He attached a hawser to her with a view of towing her into the nearest port, about 500 miles distant. After a good deal of trouble, the cable parting several times, he succeeded in getting her into Boston,

It was not long before the prize was identified and not much longer before it became evident that there had been Friday on business. reports that the horsemen are all then has charge of the dining room fraud in her abandonment. The water was pumped out of her and a hole was found in her bottom, indicating that she had been scuttled. She was overinsured and, the two taken together, indicated that it was a case of attempted fraud on the insurance companies. When Captain Ben was told the name of the vessel he was thunderstruck. It had been for several years commanded by his rival.

The next news Captain Ben learned was that Captain Cady bad arrived at home, reporting that after a frightful storm, finding his ship in a sinking condition, he had considered it necessary to take to the boats. All the crew were saved. Proofs of loss had been made to the insurance companies and payment was daily expected.

It was evident to Ben that in order to overreach him in the wherewithal to marry Maggie his rival had been tempted to commit a fraud which would land him in state prison. Leaving his first mate to sail his ship into her destined port, Ben went home by land. As soon as he arrived he sought out his rival and told him of the finding of his ship, the towing her into port and the discoveries that had followed.

"I don't wish to see you punished for your crime," said Ben, "and have come to enable you to get away." It was evident from the culprit's demeanor that he was already severely punished in the loss of the girl be had boped to win by fraud. But whether there was thankfulness in his heart to the man who had given him an opportunity to escape a prison, Ben did not feel assured. Certain it is that Jack Cady was never again seen in New England after that interview.

When Captain Ben met Maggle Swift he found her much disturbed. His rival had shown that he was about to receive considerable money for his last voyage and had made application to her father for her hand. She did not wish to marry Jack, but she idolized her father. Ben told her of his finding a ship and that considerable prize money was due him, which he would receive in time. But he said never a word of Jack's attempt to defraud. However, it was not long before the whole matter came out and Maggleand her father too-learned that if it had not been for Ben's find, had ber father prevailed, she would have mar-

And so it was that a disbonest man's rascality was turned to his honest rival's advantage.
