Passengers on Big Liners Play Games to While Away the Time

Photo copyright by American Press Association, 1911

ASSENGERS on the big Atlantic tiners have many ways of passing the long days while the steamship races along on its way across the ocean. One of these games is shown in the picture above. It is a jumping the rope race between girls and women who were second cabin passengers. Small prizes were offered for the winners, and an admission fee was charged. The sums paid by the spectators were added to the seamen's fund. In the first cabin concerts are always given, any actors or actresses who may be on board usually donating their services to help the same worthy charity. The marks that appear on the deck above were made in a sort of hopscotch game that had preceded the race. When the weather is calm these big vessels—the picture was made on the Mauretania—move along steadily, and nearly all of the passengers spend the daylight hours on deck.
