GROWERS WAIT FOR HIGHER PRICES

Only a small fraction of the Oregon potato crop yet remains undug, probably not more than ten per cent of the state's output, and the harvested portion of the crop is safely stored in pits and cellars and will stay there until the growers are ready to sell. In general the producers are reported to be bullish in the extreme. Consequently the movement now is a very moderate one. Buyers say there is a fair demand in the South at this time and to supply this they are offering $1 to $1.15 for Burbanks, around $1 for Early Rose, and $1.10 to $1.25 a hundred for Garnets and American Wonders, at shipping points in this state. A few carloads are being picked up here and there, but business is still far from active, and probably will be so until after the first of the year.

The heavy movement southward of Oregon potatoes usually does not start until after the middle of December, and sometimes not until January. The growers this year seem to have determined not to unload at all freely until in the season, and the general supply and demand situation at this time would appear to warrant them in holding. The market fundamentally is sound and the belief is general that better prices than are now offered will be available later in the season. Buyers, however, insist that if too great a portion of the crop is held for the later market, and then sold too freely, there is danger of a bad break. This has occurred in some past seasons, and for this reason the dealers are advising the farmers to let go in a moderate way, with a view to keeping the market on a healthy basis.

Sweet potatoes are not coming from the South with the freedom of a month or two ago, and the market as a result is steadily stiffening. Prevailing Oregon City prices are as follows: Fruits, Vegetables. DRIED FRUITS - (Buying) - Prunes on basis of 6 1-4 pounds for 45-50's. HIDES - (Buying) - Green hides, 5c to 6c; salted, 5c to 6c; dry hides, 12c to 14c; sheep pelts, 25c to 75c each.

'I'M IN RACE TO STAY' - BEATIE

(Continued from Page 1.) are thrown open, there is little time for a line of campaign, other than that which has been in progress. The municipal situation is peculiar, to say the least. Mr. Andresen, who had the field to himself up to the time of the simultaneous entry of Beatie and Dimick, is apparently making a "gunshoe" campaign. He only entered the race at the earnest solicitation of scores of his friends, and consented to become a candidate after a petition, bearing the names of nearly half the voting population of Oregon City and presented to him. If he is marked as a sacrifice, he can still retain his self respect and go up to the defeat with the complete knowledge that he made no frantic struggle for the place. Much of the opposition to Mr. Andresen comes from the people who feel that someone must be made the "goat" for the extensive improvement of Oregon City's streets, and as Mr. Andresen is up for them to take a shot at, they will take secret satisfaction in it. The liquor interests, it is said, do not take kindly to Mr. Andresen's candidacy. Dr. Beatie has a large number of warm personal friends who would like to see him honored by the election to the mayoralty, and are making a quiet campaign in his behalf. Close political observers, however, say that Dimick will be the next Mayor of Oregon City. They aver that the opposition is split, which of course may be said of either of the other candidates, and there is every reason to believe that the man who served Oregon City as Mayor four years has a very formidable corps of workers who are letting no opportunity slip by to make votes for him.

Mrs. Pedrie's Secret It Proved the Truth of the Lady's Statement By CLARISSA MACKIE Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

"Of course women can't help being inquisitive," said Mrs. Pedrie loftily. "I always make allowances, Phoebe, for woman's greatest failing, or has he so many it's hard to select the largest?" demanded Mrs. Pedrie, with spirit. "Talk about curiosity, why, Phineas Pedrie, I've seen just as many curious men as you have women - so there!"

"Phaw, Phoebe! You cannot name one case where a man has displayed more than ordinary interest in affairs which were not his own." And Mrs. Pedrie folded his newspaper and challenged his wife with raised brows. Apparently Mrs. Pedrie could not give the desired illustration, for she retired behind the pages of a book with an expression of displeasure on her pretty countenance. Mr. Pedrie napped in his Turkish rocker more or less musically, and after awhile his wife felt to watching him closely. All at once a bright smile chased away the displeasure from her face, and she softly arose and left the room.

At the end of an hour Mrs. Pedrie stretched herself luxuriously, yawned sleepily, and, seeing his wife reading on the opposite side of the table, he sank into somnolence once more. The striking of the hall clock awoke him to a realization that it was midnight and he was alone. Phoebe had evidently gone to bed, as was often her custom, and left him to come to bed when he was quite ready.

He felt singularly wide awake. The house was very quiet, and save for the occasional rattle of a distant electric car the street was still. It was just the time for another dip into that scientific magazine while he smoked a cigar. He reached for his cigar case and looked for the magazine. His glance fell upon a handsome box which stood on the table near Phoebe's chair. He had never seen the box before, and his interest was aroused. He went around the table and examined it. It was made of polished rosewood, with corners and hinges of old brass. It was tightly locked, and there was no key. He lifted the box and found it heavy.

He stood looking down at it with a baffled expression on his good natured countenance. He wondered why Phoebe should have left the box there, and at this instant there was a rustling on the stairs, and Phoebe came rushing in, garbed in dressing gown and slippers and with her heavy braids swinging to and fro. She seemed to take in the situation at a glance - the proximity of her husband to the rosewood box - for with a little frightened gasp she darted forward, took the box from his hands and left the room without so much as a word of explanation.

Phineas Pedrie stood rooted to the spot with consternation. Was Phoebe insane, or was she walking in her sleep? What was there about the rosewood box that he, her husband, might not see? What? Mr. Pedrie stalked slowly up the stairs to find Phoebe sleeping sweetly and the rosewood box nowhere in sight. "What has she done with it?" he muttered anxiously as he stepped softly to and fro so as not to waken her. Fifteen minutes later the rosewood box. He had explored all the closets in the house and the spare room and was creaking downstairs in the belief that his wife had concealed the box in the hall before she ascended to her room when her voice smote on his ear. "Phineas, where are you?" she called sleepily. "I'm coming, dear," he assured her, making his voice as small as possible, as if it might come from the library where she had left him. "It must be midnight, Phin. Are you never coming? This light keeps me awake." "I'll put it out, Phoebe," and Mr. Pedrie creaked up the stairs again and snatched off the bulb. "I've lost my match case, and I'm looking for it. I'll
