The Woman's Club

There was a time when the mention of a woman's club brought up visions of hothouse flowers, cards, pate de foie gras and a headache. Then came clubs devoted to the study of Shakespeare, Browning, art and music—all for the betterment of the woman. Now that clubs are being formed for the betterment of the other woman, the country has cause for pride. And men are beginning to realize that instead of the joke they have always considered a woman's club, it is a force to be reckoned with.

The Woman's Club of Oregon City has done good work in the past, and having banded themselves together to assist in the education of worthy girls, as well as many other public spirited works, the city should congratulate itself on the number of broadminded, thinking women it evidently has within its gates.

A MOCK MARRIAGE

By R. D. CHATSWORTH

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

Though twenty-seven is young for a man, he feels at that age usually the first tinge of ennui at his bachelorhood. The first freshness of youth has gone out of him, and a vision of a home enlivened by wife and children looms up before him.

Walter Nixon had reached this age, or, rather, in his case, it was standing between the period of thoughtless youth and thoughtful middle age. One day he was skyjarking with a lot of young men and women when some one proposed that they should have a mock wedding.

"I'll be the bride," said Jaqueline Woodruff, a girl who was always first and foremost in any prank.

"And I'll be the groom," said Walter gallantly since he was standing beside her at the moment, and all eyes were turned upon him.

Few young people realize that it is dangerous to trifle with a wedding, but it is.

So Walter Nixon and Jaqueline Woodruff stood up. One of the young men of the party asked if they would take each other for husband and wife. Walter took a seal ring off his finger and put it on that of Jaqueline, the man who was officiating pronounced them man and wife, and amid many jokes and much laughter, they received congratulations from the others. No one considered it anything more than an escapade, and when a new amusement was proposed the spectators forgot all about the first.

A few days later Miss Woodruff, on opening her mail, read a note from Walter Nixon, beginning "My dear wife." It contained an invitation to the theater and several facetious remarks as to her duty toward the writer as her husband. It was all very funny, and somehow it sounded rather pleasant. She was of a marriageable age and since she was twenty-two years old thought it high time she should be married. Nixon was a good fellow, able to support a wife and generally acceptable. Jaqueline did not know how much of joke and how much of earnest there was in his letter, but she felt at liberty to reply in kind. So she began her letter "My dear husband" and signed it "Your loving wife."

Soon after this Nixon was telling Cummings, a lawyer friend, about "the joke," as he called it. Cummings looked a trifle serious, whereupon Nixon asked him if he thought anything of import could come of it.

"The lady," replied the lawyer, "if she were disposed to claim you as her husband, might make it very unpleasant for you."

"You don't mean it?" exclaimed Nixon.

"You have addressed her as 'My dear wife,' which is pretty good evidence in law that you have married her. Suppose she says she considered the marriage a contract. What are you going to do about it with your letter in her hands?"

"By Jove! I never thought of that. What shall I do?"

"The only thing you can do is to get your letter and destroy it."

"I'll do it at once."

That evening Nixon called on Miss Woodruff for the express purpose of returning her letter and getting possession of his own. She was in a very becoming costume and smiled on him pleasantly.

"I'm glad you've come, dear," she said, with a twinkle in her eye. "I've been in an agony for fear you had met with some accident. How could you remain so long away from me?"

How pleasant that sounded! Though the words were in fun, he thought he would like to hear more of her kind. He would keep up the pleasantry for awhile before mentioning the matter of the exchange of letters. So he said something to her that he considered proper for a husband to say to a wife, forgetting that it was more appropriate for a lover, and it was all so funny that they kept it up for some time. Before departing he said:

"My friend Cummings says that if you really choose to claim me—I mean if I really choose to claim you for my wife—I might put you to a lot of trouble."

"What trouble?"

"Well, I might insist that our marriage was serious."

"Well?"

"And you might"—He stopped. "Put you to a lot of trouble." She looked down on the floor, apparently much pained.

"Not that. You might"—

"Might what?"

Her voice trembled a little. "Oh, I can't get it out. Don't feel sure I didn't mean to say anything I should be sorry for—that is, nothing you should be sorry to hear. I'm awfully ashamed. There's nothing to cry about."

There seemed to be an irresistible attraction in the girl's waist for the man's arm and an equally irresistible attraction in the man's shoulder for the girl's head. There were a few incoherent murmurings, and the cart was harnessed before the horse. In other words, their wedding had preceded the engagement.

Their friends declared that there was no need of another marriage, for they had intended to be married by the first, but the bride bridled at such an accusation and insisted on a large and splendid wedding.

EXCUSES.

Every wrongdoer has a ready excuse; therefore it is better to refrain from excusing ourselves, even with good reason. To forego excuses is an element of strength.

A Parallel Case.

"Here's an account of a fellow who took two years to make a toothpick." "Some overdrawn, eh?" "Oh, I don't know! I know of a mother who took five years to make a match."—Louisville Courier-Journal.
