They will leave this week for Alaska.

A. B. Wilmot, who has been very ill for the past two months of typhoid fever, was able to be out on the street Wednesday for the first time. Mr. Wilmot received Wednesday morning from Wataga, Ill., as a gift a handsome gold headed cane beautifully engraved, this being presented to his grandfather, the late Amos Wilmot on his fiftieth wedding anniversary, and which was later presented to the latter's son, S. K. Wilmot, who died a month ago in Illinois, and now it becomes the property of A. B. Wilmot, of this city. At the death of Amos Wilmot it was his request that the cane be kept in the Wilmot family, and Mr. Wilmot, who is recovering from his siege of illness finds that it arrived at the right time, and is making good use of it. Although still very weak from his illness he is improving rapidly and it will be several weeks before he will be able to resume his position with the Harding drug firm.

Jumel Mansion Was Long Occupied by Washington

Historic Building in New York City Has Been Turned Into Museum of Colonial Relics

Washington Left the House Only Fifteen Minutes Before Arrival of the British

NO Revolutionary landmark in New York city—and few in the United States—occupies so commanding a position as the Jumel mansion. Standing on Washington heights, in the northern part of Manhattan island, it overlooks the greater part of the city, the Hudson and the Palisades of New Jersey and, on a clear day, the waters of the East river, Long Island sound and the Connecticut and Long Island shores. It divides with Fraunces' tavern and the subtreasury in Wall street the reverent interest of pilgrims to the shrines associated with the great name of Washington and makes a deeper impression on the average sightseer than either of the others.

This house, also known as the Morris house, was the military headquarters of Washington and his staff on Harlem heights, as that eminence was called in Revolutionary times. Here occurred Washington's first meeting with General (then Captain) Alexander Hamilton. Here he received the unannounced visit of a deputation of Indian chiefs, not knowing whether their errand was peaceful or warlike. From this house he was driven by the British under Lord Howe, and to it he returned after he had been elected president of the United States.

Colonel Roger Morris, who was Washington's companion in arms in the ill fated Braddock expedition, built the mansion as a home for his bride to be, Miss Mary Philpotts, whose hand the Father of His Country had sought without success. It was begun in 1760 and finished in 1768. Morris was a royalist and after the breaking out of the war took his family to England. His American property was confiscated by the colonial government, but the crown made good his losses. The Harlem heights property having been settled upon Mrs. Morris by an antenuptial agreement, the claim of her heirs was bought by John Jacob Astor, and the house subsequently passed into the possession of Stephen Jumel, a wealthy French wine merchant, whose widow, at the age of sixty, was married to Aaron Burr, then a discredited old man of seventy-eight.

Much later the mansion and grounds were acquired by the late General Ferdinand Pinney Earle, a lineal descendant of the original owner, and his widow lived in the house until the city purchased it and turned it into a museum of Revolutionary relics under the care of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

The period of Washington's occupation was the summer of 1776. He made the Morris house his headquarters immediately after his defeat in the battle of Long Island. From this point he observed the British, who held the city and the southern part of the island, while they were throwing up intrenchments of which the outer line was at what is now Ninety-fourth street, and here he remained, with one short absence, until the unfortunate issue of the battle of Harlem Heights compelled his retirement to Fort Lee, on the Palisades, across the Hudson.

During Washington's occupation of the mansion it was the scene of the councils of war of himself and his staff. He gave audience here to Nathan Hale before he went upon the mission which was to bring him death and an imperishable fame. Hamilton was in command of a battery and was superintending the building of earthworks for Fort Washington, which occupied high ground not far from the mansion, and his alertness and ability won him the respect and regard of Washington, which endured until his death at the hand of Burr, of whom the commander in chief at the same time conceived a lasting distrust.

The flower of the Continental army were gathered here—General Lee, of whom great things were expected because of his successes in the south; General Putnam, General Greene and General Mercer. On the west side of the house is shown a room in which Washington and the members of his military family talked over their plans, and its antique wall paper (now carefully removed to a smaller room) is said to have been hung by the staff. Washington himself mixing the paste.

A picturesque incident which occurred during the occupation was the reception by Washington of a deputation of Stockbridge (Mass.) Indians. So many of the red men had taken the side of the British that these blanketed visitors were viewed with some distrust by the general's attendants, but it developed that they had come to assure him of their friendship.

Washington left the house only fifteen minutes before the British, victorious in their assault upon Fort Washington, took possession of his late headquarters. He visited it in 1783 with Rochambeau on his triumphal return to the city. He did not enter it again until he was president of the United States, and he made an entry in his diary of the date of his visit, July 10, 1790. In the party that accompanied him were the vice president, John Adams, and his wife, the secretaries of state, the treasury and war and the wives of the last two.

CLOCK PRESENTED BY LAFAYETTE.

The visitors rambled about the places in the surrounding country which had been so well known to Washington in the dark days of the Revolution, and on their return, in spite of the urgency of their host, Mr. Mariner, at that time the owner of the mansion, who had expected them to partake of an elaborate banquet in the great dining room, insisted upon picnicking on the grass under the trees.

When Stephen Jumel became the owner of the mansion in 1810 his wife made it a rendezvous for society second to none in the city for lavish entertaining. Among the distinguished foreign guests who enjoyed its hospitality were the Prince de Joinville, Louis Napoleon and Jerome Bonaparte. Immediately after the marriage of the widow to Burr he sought to have the deeds of the property transferred to him, but the couple quarreled in a few weeks, and thus no excuse was ever given for calling the mansion by the name of the man who shares the pilory with Arnold in the minds of American schoolboys.

The house is built of heavy timbers, and its walls are lined with bricks which were imported from Holland. There has never been a change in the style of its exterior, and such changes as have been made in the interior have been few and in harmony with the colonial character of its architecture.

A relief medalion of Washington and a memorial tablet, both of them placed there by patriotic societies, are

Washington was fond of the theater, and he patronized the circus when opportunity presented. He also liked to see all sorts of cheap shows, such as a dancing bear, a wax works exhibition, a puppet performance and the like.

on the front of the house. Among the hundreds of relics preserved in it are a cup and saucer used by Washington when he was president and a clock presented to him by Lafayette, which was at one time an ornament of the household at Mount Vernon.

Tradition has given the Jumel mansion a ghost. It is that of a woman, presumably, for, although invisible, its presence is or was made manifest by the rustling of a silken gown, and the unfortunate who heard the rustling—at night, of course—was likely to feel the next minute a vicious pinch. A secret passage, that other indispensable feature of an ancient mansion, runs parallel to the upper hall. Through this the last of the American occupants rushed when the house was taken by the British, climbed out upon the balcony, dropped to the ground and escaped.

Washington's Great Strength.

General Washington's large tent, wrapped up in its poles, required two men to place it in the wagon, but the general himself could pick it up in one hand and toss it into the vehicle with ease. Many stories were current in his time regarding his great feats of strength. As a hammer thrower no doubt he would have won the championship. He threw a stone across the Rappahannock river at Fredericksburg. He threw another from the top of the Palisades into the Hudson river. He climbed the walls of the Natural bridge of Virginia. Thus great strength went with great stature. But Washington's lungs were weak and his voice never strong, says Akerson.

MRS. LATOURETTE ENTERTAINS AT BRIDGE

Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer D. Latourette entertained the members of the Tuesday Night Bridge Club at their home Fourteenth and Main streets, Tuesday evening. The evening was devoted to bridge and the prizes were won by Mrs. Hiram E. Straight and E. A. Chapman. A luncheon was served, and a most delightful evening was spent. The decorations of the Latourette home were very pretty, being of magnolias, Japonica blossoms and carnations.

Present were Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Shevman, Mr. and Mrs. Linwood E. Jones, Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Latourette, of Portland, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram E. Straight, Mr. and Mrs. John Adams, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. O. W. Eastham, Dr. and Mrs. A. L. Beale, Mrs. Nieta Lawrence, Mrs. William Leithwaite, Miss Cis Pratt, John Latourette, Harry E. Draper, Mrs. C. D. Latourette.

Underwood Typewriter

UNDERWOOD SERVICE

A few years ago typewriters were used only for letter writing. But it is different today. Their field of usefulness has increased many fold. The UNDERWOOD introduced typewriter bookkeeping and the use of the typewriter for special accounting, recording and statistical purposes.

There are over a score of special model Underwoods for special uses. Many corporations use four times as many UNDERWOODS for accounting work as for correspondence.

Department stores, banks, insurance companies, corporations, manufacturers and retailers use Underwood systems—condensed billing system, unit bill and order system, bill and charge system, and others planned for their particular needs.
